Putting the Baby IN the Bath Water: Give priority to prevention and first 1001 days

Citation for published version:

Link:
Link to publication record in Edinburgh Research Explorer

Document Version:
Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Publisher Rights Statement:

General rights
Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Edinburgh Research Explorer is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy
The University of Edinburgh has made every reasonable effort to ensure that Edinburgh Research Explorer content complies with UK legislation. If you believe that the public display of this file breaches copyright please contact openaccess@ed.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.
Putting the Baby IN the Bath Water:
Give priority to prevention and the first 1,001 days

Collective supplemental evidence submitted to the Scottish Parliament about the Children and Young People Bill

The Scottish Parliament is currently considering the Children and Young People (Scotland) Bill. Stage 1 of this process is due to end by 29 November 2013. In September 2013, the following collective statement and recommendations were developed and agreed by a wide range of respected organisations and distinguished individuals. It was then submitted to the lead committee for this Bill (the Education and Culture Committee).

There is still time to influence this important legislation in ways that will increase its positive impact upon the first 1,001 days of every child’s life across Scotland. Please read this statement and consider what you can do to help. It includes how to get further information or become involved.
Putting the Baby IN the Bath Water: Give priority to prevention and the first 1,001 days

This document offers the shared views and recommendations of a wide variety of organisations and individuals (listed at the end). All the signatories appreciate the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Government’s desire to enact legislation that will move our nation closer to becoming ‘the best place to grow up’. We all share that goal and understand that the Children and Young People Bill is the one major legislative proposal since the Scottish Parliament was created that directly focuses on children’s rights, children’s services and the wellbeing of children and young people. It represents a crucial and welcome window of opportunity. We propose five additional ways to make the most of this opportunity.

It is a complex Bill of many parts. Our view is that when seen as a ‘jigsaw puzzle’, one fundamental piece is missing. The Bill does not provide a robust statutory foundation for positive action during the first 1,001 days of life (from pre-birth to age 2).

There is a disconnect between the case made for the Bill in its accompanying Policy Memorandum and actual provisions proposed within the Bill. We think this Bill, as introduced, should be amended to connect the dots between its Policy Memorandum and the Bill itself. Its excellent analysis of the wisdom of investing in the earliest years through preventative spending is not reflected in what this legislation actually proposes to do.

We do not believe that primary legislation is the only, or always the best, way of advancing policy, and continuing education of those working with mothers/fathers/carers during the first 1,001 days of every child’s life should give priority to developing effective, positive, relationship-based support. The Government should also ensure that sufficient numbers of very skilled, knowledgeable, relationship-focused supporters for mothers/fathers/carers are available and sustained for at least these first 1,001 days. More and better support is necessary.

This Bill should require robust assessments/measures of the extent to which – and reasons why – positive/secure attachment and other key dimensions of healthy emotional, social, intellectual and physical development are (or are not) being achieved with all children (pre-birth to age 2) in Scotland. These assessments should create the evidence base that generates effective interventions benefitting young children and their families swiftly and fully.

The Scottish Parliament should integrate prevention explicitly into the aims of children’s services planning already listed in the Bill. This should lead to meaningful planning for, and regular reporting of progress toward, a better balance between prevention and reaction by public bodies. Priority should be accorded to ‘primary prevention’, which keeps harm to young children in Scotland from happening in the first place.

MSPs should act upon this unique chance to reinvent and reinvigorate the health visiting profession as an indispensable part of Scotland’s early years workforce.

None of these significant steps toward Scotland really becoming ‘the best place to grow up’ have been included in the Children and Young People Bill, as introduced. These are major omissions that could, and should, be corrected before this legislation is enacted.

These five recommended substantive improvements to the Bill are not just good ideas. There is an ever-expanding national and international body of evidence proving the case that what happens (or fails to happen) during the first 1,001 days of life has a powerful and enduring influence not only on the rest of every child’s life – but also on the wellbeing of our families, schools, communities, economy and society.

Put simply, there now is compelling evidence that: a) beyond genetics, parent/child relationships, in general, and the quality of attachment, in particular, shape brain development; b) such brain and central nervous development in very early childhood shapes lifelong attitudes and behaviours; and, c) these attitudes and behaviours shape everything from school success to criminality -- and from employability to mental health problems or substance abuse.

Many of the signatories to this supplemental evidence have already provided such data and research findings to the Education Committee. Upon request, we can provide additional information – as well as specific suggestions about how and where to build our recommendations into this Bill. Prevention, preparation and support for the earliest years of life are matters that should no longer be subject to the changing preferences of, and pressures upon, successive national and local governments. Only as part of Scots law can these cornerstones of a healthy, fair and successful Scotland take their rightful place on the ‘must do’ list for public policy and governmental action.

In summary, we, collectively and individually, encourage the Scottish Parliament to literally ‘put the baby IN the bath water’ by adding these missing elements to this Bill. Doing so will make preventative spending and pragmatic, positive action during the first 1,001 days of life a reality, rather than remaining a good intention outwith its boundaries.

September 2013
WAVE Trust is acting as the coordinator of this collective statement on behalf of the signatories. If you would like further information or to become involved, then please contact Dr Jonathan Sher at jsher@wavetrust.org or on 0744 333 1953.