Book review: Christianity and the state in Asia. Complicity and conflict

Citation for published version:

Digital Object Identifier (DOI):
10.1017/S0022046912000929

Link:
Link to publication record in Edinburgh Research Explorer

Document Version:
Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Published in:
The Journal of Ecclesiastical History

Publisher Rights Statement:

General rights
Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Edinburgh Research Explorer is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy
The University of Edinburgh has made every reasonable effort to ensure that Edinburgh Research Explorer content complies with UK legislation. If you believe that the public display of this file breaches copyright please contact openaccess@ed.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

Christopher Harding

The Journal of Ecclesiastical History / Volume 63 / Issue 04 / October 2012, pp 856 - 856
DOI: 10.1017/S0022046912000929, Published online: 17 September 2012

Link to this article: http://journals.cambridge.org/abstract_S0022046912000929

How to cite this article:
Christopher Harding (2012). The Journal of Ecclesiastical History, 63, pp 856-856 doi:10.1017/S0022046912000929

Request Permissions : Click here man, then it certainly does sustain the rather austere analysis of Butterfield’s religious and intellectual imperatives given above. More than this, and more important than this, the end results fully justify Michael Bentley’s immense labour on the subject, producing a study which is a pleasure to read as well as an education. This is a splendid book.

St John’s College, Oxford

William Whyte

JEH (63) 2012; doi:10.1017/S0022046912000929

Much has been made in recent years of a ‘southern shift’ in global Christianity, away from the weakening Christian institutions of the global north and towards Latin America and Africa, where in many regions Christianity’s demographic and cultural strength is on the increase. Asia appears as something of an anomaly in this north-south model, its Christians more often than not greatly outnumbered by those of other religions (or none), facing governmental ambivalence or even hostility. From this difficult, complex situation, comes the ‘complicity and conflict’ explored in this multi-disciplinary set of essays. The core contention here is that models of ‘southern’ Christianity based in the Latin American and African experiences simply do not apply in Asia, least of all the idea that Christianity functions largely independently of state structures: instead, so the argument goes, Christianity gets its diversity in Asia precisely from the multifarious ways in which, over many decades, it has had to work with (sometimes helping to bring about the demise of) a broad range of political conditions all with long and tangled historical roots. One might ask whether amidst this great diversity in the region the concept of ‘Asian Christianity’ really makes sense at all. Perhaps wisely, this volume avoids pushing its luck here, instead focusing mostly on telling examples of the relationship between Christianity and the state in particular countries or subregions: south-east Asia, Japan, Tibet, India, China, the Philippines, Singapore and South Korea. The examples are well chosen, ranging from religious and cultural dimensions of post-war reconstruction (Japan) and the aspiring secularism of a post-colonial state (India), to the Catholic Church’s interventions in politics and its attempt to cast what the state would like to see as a public health issue (HIV/AIDS in the Philippines) as one of sexual morality and therefore part of its ‘territory’. The chapters here are brief, engaging, and come with useful bibliographies, making this a worthwhile introductory offering for a global Christianity audience (especially given the general predominance of work on Africa and Latin America), an ‘afterword’ for students of colonial-era Christian mission, and possibly good material for political scientists looking for case studies of how minority religious groups interact with states.

University of Edinburgh

Christopher Harding