An Additional Protective Layer

Citation for published version:

Digital Object Identifier (DOI):
10.2139/ssrn.2317813

Link:
Link to publication record in Edinburgh Research Explorer

Document Version:
Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Publisher Rights Statement:

General rights
Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Edinburgh Research Explorer is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy
The University of Edinburgh has made every reasonable effort to ensure that Edinburgh Research Explorer content complies with UK legislation. If you believe that the public display of this file breaches copyright please contact openaccess@ed.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.
An Additional Protective Layer: the case of religious discrimination in the United Kingdom and Germany

Dr Tobias Lock
Lecturer
University of Edinburgh, School of Law
tobias.lock@ed.ac.uk
Forthcoming in the European Law Review
Abstract
This paper compares how two closely related remedies, freedom of religion and the belief discrimination, are applied by domestic courts in the United Kingdom and Germany. It concludes that the current practice of the courts in these two countries differs considerably and questions why that is so given that the courts in both countries operate under essentially the same European legal framework determined by the ECHR and the EU law. It is suggested that decision-making by domestic courts is still influenced by traditional domestic remedies and that domestic courts seem to find it difficult to adapt to new remedies. The article then gauges the potential for a common European approach, which, while theoretically possible, is unlikely to be triggered by either of the two European courts. This is because cases dealing with religion often touch on core constitutional values, which both courts usually respect.

Keywords
freedom of religion; belief discrimination; Germany; United Kingdom; EU anti-discrimination law
An additional protective layer: the case of religious discrimination in the United Kingdom and Germany

by Tobias Lock*

I. Introduction

This paper contains a comparative study of the law on religious freedom and belief discrimination in Germany and the United Kingdom. Religious freedom and belief discrimination are intertwined and often the same factual situation can give rise to claims under both heads. The aim of this paper is to show how the two are used in practice by British and German courts. A comparison between these two countries is interesting for three main reasons. First, both are Member States with a large population so that one can assume that they have seen ample litigation allowing for a meaningful comparative study. Second, in both countries there are sizeable numbers of people with non-traditional beliefs. In Germany, 35% of the population are non-believers and 5% are Muslim. The remaining 60% follow traditional Christian religions.¹ The numbers in the United Kingdom are similar. According to the 2011 census for England and Wales there are about 25% of the population stating to have no belief, 4.8% Muslims, and 60% Christians.² The numbers for the United Kingdom as a whole are unlikely to differ greatly. These demographics constitute a challenge to the traditional arrangements in place. These are still largely informed by the traditional majoritarian bias, in particular in the employment and education context, e.g. when it comes to dress codes or time off for worship. Third, the two countries have very different legal traditions. While the United Kingdom has a tradition of home grown anti-discrimination law, German anti-discrimination law was only introduced through obligations arising from Germany’s EU membership. In contrast, Germany has a long and strong tradition of fundamental rights review, whereas this is quite a recent phenomenon in the United Kingdom. The paper shows that the current practice of the courts in these two countries differs considerably even though a European framework is in existence, which would suggest that the rules are applied equally throughout. Despite this common framework it is suggested that current practice in the two Member States under scrutiny is very much influenced by domestic legal tradition. This paper hopes to make a contribution to discussion on law and religion by showing how belief discrimination is applied in Member State courts. Belief discrimination is particularly interesting for testing the understanding of domestic courts of anti-discrimination law for three reasons. First, it is a relatively new characteristic, which was only introduced into EU law with the Framework Directive in 2000. Second, religious discrimination protects individuals alongside religious freedom, which is a

* Dr Tobias Lock, Lecturer, School of Law, University of Edinburgh, tobias.lock@ed.ac.uk. I would like to thank all participants of the workshop held at the EUCE York University, Toronto, Dr Myriam Hunter-Henin (UCL), and my colleagues of the Surrey European Law Unit Michael Connolly, Theodore Konstadinides, Filippo Fontanelli, and Kanstantsin Dzehtsiarou for helpful comments. All errors are of course my own.
human right guaranteed both in the UK and Germany. Third, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) has not yet spoken on the issue since not a single case on religious discrimination has been referred to it yet. From this one can infer a lack of guidance from the ECJ, which justifies the assumption that the case law on belief discrimination has developed autonomously in the Member States. Thus the paper is also a contribution to research on how European law (EU and ECHR law) is applied in domestic courts. The paper is divided into four parts. The first part explains the relatively complex legal framework regarding the protection of religious freedom and against religious discrimination in both Member States. The second part then explores how cases on religious discrimination have been decided by the courts in both countries. It is shown that the level of protection differs between the two countries and that in the United Kingdom cases dealing with individual beliefs were in the past more likely to succeed as non-discrimination cases whereas in Germany such cases were more likely to succeed as freedom of religion cases. The third part makes an attempt at explaining why the approaches in both countries differ and the fourth part discusses whether a convergence in approach is likely in the future.

II. A Multi-Layered Legal Framework

In order to provide a background for the comparison, it is necessary to briefly sketch out the complex legal framework governing belief discrimination and the right to religious freedom at both European and national level. Religious freedom and anti-discrimination law stem from a multitude of sources and their respective legal value differs between legal orders.

1. European law

Guarantees of religious freedom and prohibitions to discriminate on the grounds of religion and belief can be found both in the law of the European Union and in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). EU primary law protects freedom of thought, conscience and religion in Article 10 of the recently introduced Charter of Fundamental Rights (CFR). Moreover, the Charter contains a chapter on equality with a relatively comprehensive non-discrimination provision in Article 21.³ The Charter is only of limited applicability in Member State courts. Its scope is defined in Article 51 CFR, which provides that the European Union itself is fully bound by the Charter whereas the Member States are only bound by it when they are implementing European Union law. The exact boundaries of the applicability of the Charter in the Member States have not yet been established. One can, however, conclude from the recent decision of the ECJ in Åkerberg Fransson that the ECJ is opting for a wide approach to the meaning of ‘implementing Union law’ contained in Art. 51 (1) CFR. Confirming its pre-Charter case law⁴, the Court held that a Member State was bound by the Charter where it acted within the scope of EU law. It was held that criminal sanctions for non-declaration of VAT came within the scope of EU law even though the provision of national law providing for the sanction was not adopted in implementation of EU law. It was held to be sufficient that the Member State was under an EU law obligation to regulate the area of law concerned. From this one can deduct that the Court will continue to hold as it did in Kürükdeveci that an employment dispute falls within the scope of EU law where the national legislation is allegedly contrary to a rule of EU law. This would suggest that all employment disputes concerning potential discrimination contrary to one of the non-discrimination Directives would trigger the applicability of the Charter. The (in-)famous Mangold decision of the ECJ has added a further source of non-discrimination rights. The principle of non-discrimination on the grounds of age can also be found in the general principles of European Union law and it is likely that the same is true for the other characteristics found in the various non-discrimination directives.

³ Article 21 (1) provides: Any discrimination based on any ground such as sex, race, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation shall be prohibited.

The European Union legislator has been quite active in producing several anti-discrimination Directives, which are the Race Directive 2000/43/EC, the Framework Directive 2000/78/EC, and the two Gender Directives 2004/113/EC and 2006/54/EC. The Race Directive prohibits discrimination on the basis of race or ethnic origin. Its scope is relatively wide in that it is applicable to all persons, public and private. It is not limited to employment, but extends to social security, education, and access to and supply of goods and services. The Framework Directive protects against discrimination on the basis of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation. Its scope is limited to the employment context. Recast Directive 2006/54/EC is a recast version of earlier Directives on the equal treatment of men and women in employment and occupation whereas Gender Directive 2004/113/EC extends the principle of equal treatment of men and women to the access and supply of goods and services. All these Directives have in the meantime been implemented in the UK and Germany. It should be pointed out that according to the case

6 Jasper Finke, Die Parallelität internationaler Streitbeilegungsmechanismen (Duncker & Humboldt 2004).
7 Tullio Treves, ‘Conflicts Between the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea and the International Court of Justice’ 31 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 809, para 75; this was confirmed in Finke.
8 Treves, para 76; on the directives supra.
13 Race Directive, Article 3.
law of the ECJ, both primary and secondary EU law enjoy primacy over conflicting national law provisions of any rank, which means that the latter must be dis-applied.\textsuperscript{14}

The ECHR guarantees freedom of religion in its Article 9. Art 14 ECHR prohibits discrimination ‘on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.’\textsuperscript{7} It is not a free-standing anti-discrimination provision as it is only applicable where the complaint falls within the ambit of a freedom right under the Convention.\textsuperscript{15} It thus has no independent existence.\textsuperscript{16} Furthermore, it is not usually applicable in horizontal relationships. In contrast to the EU Directives and domestic anti-discrimination law, Art. 14 ECHR is wider with regard to its non-exhaustive list of characteristics. At the same time, it allows for direct discrimination to be justified.\textsuperscript{17} The Convention’s anti-discrimination Protocol no 12 was not signed by the United Kingdom and signed but not ratified by Germany. As will be shown below, the status of ECHR rights in domestic law differs from country to country and so does its practical relevance.

3. National law

The following discussion of equality law provisions and religious freedom provisions in national law focuses on the relative ‘value’ the provisions may have for claimants. This value is informed by the rank of the provision in the hierarchy of norms, which has a direct impact on the strength of judicial review, but also by the scope of provisions, in particular their applicability in private law relationships.

a. Germany

The highest source of domestic law within Germany is the federal constitution, the Basic Law (Grundgesetz – GG).\textsuperscript{18} It contains a catalogue of fundamental rights, of which Article 3 and 4 GG are of relevance to this paper. Article 3 (1) GG postulates equality before the law and Article 3 (2) and (3) contain prohibitions of discrimination, including discrimination on the basis of faith and religious opinions. However, Article 3 GG is generally applicable only in vertical relationships and not between individuals.

Article 4 (1) and (2) protect freedom of faith and conscience and freedom to profess a religious or political creed and the undisturbed practice of religion. In this it resembles

---

\textsuperscript{15} Cf. C-459/03 Commission v Ireland ECR 2006 I-4635.

\textsuperscript{17} E.g. in Internationale Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Einfuhr- und Vorratsstelle für Getreide und Futtermittel, para 36-37 the ECtHR considered whether direct discrimination on the basis of ethnicity could be justified.

\textsuperscript{18} This discussion will concentrate on federal law since state law does not add substantively to the protection in place.
Article 9 ECHR. The main difference is that Article 9 (2) ECHR contains an express derogation provision whereas Article 4 GG can only be derogated from where there are colliding interests of constitutional significance, such as the fundamental rights of others. Article 4 (1) and (2) GG does not have direct horizontal effect, and can only be indirectly applied in horizontal relationships.19 Fundamental rights must be respected by all three branches of government.20 Legislation and executive action must comply with them in order to be constitutional. This means that normally fundamental rights only have vertical effect. However, ordinary courts must interpret private law in accordance with the requirements of fundamental rights and where private law provisions are phrased in a general manner (so-called general clauses), fundamental rights are held to have a ‘radiating effect’ on private law.21 Thus they inform and influence the interpretation of general clauses (so called mittelbare Drittwirkung; indirect horizontal effect).22 Individuals have access to the Federal Constitutional Court (FCC) by way of a constitutional complaint (Verfassungsbeschwerde) in case their fundamental rights have been violated and where remedies in the ordinary courts have been exhausted. The FCC has the power to strike down legislation if it deems it in violation of provisions on the Basic Law.

The EU’s equality directives were transposed into German law by the Allgemeines Gleichbehandlungsgesetz (AGG), which entered into force in August 2006. The AGG is the first comprehensive piece of anti-discrimination legislation in Germany. The introduction of anti-discrimination law in Germany was anything but uncontroversial. The AGG’s drafting process was accompanied by strong criticism and fears about its impact on freedom to contract. Freedom to contract (or private autonomy) is a fundamental right guaranteed by Article 2 (1) GG. Thus anti-discrimination provisions limiting this freedom, which includes the freedom to choose with whom to contract, were seen with great suspicion.23 Commentators went even so far to suggest that the AGG would spell the end of private autonomy24 and indeed of liberty. The extremer side of the argument was summarised by Picker thus: If ‘everyone is protected against everything’, then nobody is protected against anything.25 The hostility towards anti-discrimination law in some German legal quarters was again visible in the hefty debates following the ECJ’s Mangold decision, which had suggested the existence of an (unwritten) general principle of non-discrimination in EU primary law.26

19 Cf. infra.
20 Art 1 (3) GG.
21 BVerfGE 7, 198 (Lüth).
22 Ibid.
24 Baer, 291.
25 Picker, 772.
26 Some of the arguments can be found in Colm O’Cinneide, ‘The Uncertain Foundations of Contemporary Anti-Discrimination Law’ (2011) 11 International Journal of Discrimination and the Law 7, 16-17; the controversy
Despite this criticism, the AGG constitutes an over-implementation of the EU’s Directives in that its scope is wider than required. It outlaws discrimination on the basis of all the characteristics protected in the four Directives mentioned above in the areas of employment, social protection, education and access to and supply with goods and services. Its scope thus coincides with that of the Race Directive.

Germany was thus a relative latecomer and reluctant adopter of anti-discrimination legislation. Thus one can see a marked contrast to the situation in the United Kingdom where the first piece of anti-discrimination legislation was introduced in 1965. It seems that the reasons for this reluctance in Germany were not limited to the fears with regard to the consequences for private autonomy mentioned above. A comprehensive study by Solanke on the adoption of race discrimination legislation in both countries suggests that the wider German policy on immigration and citizenship, which was not accommodating to the inclusion of immigrants into society, had a large part to play in this. While Britain accepted ethnic minority British people as part of British society from the 1960s onwards, Germany pursued a different route by making it very difficult for non-ethnic Germans to obtain German citizenship and thus to be integrated in society. This difference in attitude may also explain why Britain thought it necessary to adopt anti-discrimination legislation in order to make sure that its citizens, no matter which ethnicity they may have, are treated equally, whereas for Germany the issue of discrimination did not appear to feature as a problem. These findings are also of relevance for the discussion of belief discrimination in Germany. After all, in many cases the victim of belief discrimination also has an immigration background.

Finally, one should briefly mention the status of the ECHR in Germany. Germany is a dualist country so that the ECHR had to be transposed into German law by way of an act of parliament. The ECHR can thus be invoked in the German courts like any other federal law. This, however, means it is limited in its effect as it cannot be used to challenge legislation before the Federal Constitutional Court. This is because the FCC’s powers of review are limited to the constitutionality of legislative acts and other state action. It does not have jurisdiction to review the compatibility of such action with the ECHR alone. Moreover, the rights contained in the ECHR rarely provide more protection than what is already guaranteed by the Basic Law itself so that applicants will usually rely on the provisions of the Basic Law when challenging either legislation or any other state action. Thus in practice the ECHR tends to be side-lined by the provisions of the Basic Law. In the rare cases of conflict between a decision of the FCC and the ECHR, the FCC tries to accommodate the decisions of the ECtHR as best as it can by employing the ECHR as an extrinsic aid to 27 Iyiola Solanke, Making Anti-Racial Discrimination Law (Routledge 2009) 14 et seq.

28 The only exception is Article 6 ECHR, which provides for fair trial guarantees not found in the Basic Law.
interpretation and by taking account of the ECtHR’s decisions. But it does not consider itself bound by them.

One can conclude that the strongest claim under German law is one based on the fundamental rights provisions in the Basic Law. It is the highest source in German law and the FCC has the power to strike down legislation if fundamental rights are violated. The ordinary courts have similar powers when it comes to conflicts between domestic law and European Union law, but that power is not widely used.

b. United Kingdom

Given its lack of a codified and entrenched constitution and the accompanying lack of constitutional review, it is no surprise that the situation in the United Kingdom differs quite substantially from that in Germany. Most strikingly, the United Kingdom did not have a codified catalogue of fundamental rights until the entry into force of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA) in October 2000. The HRA largely transposed the ECHR into domestic law. It is binding only on ‘public authorities’ and is thus not directly applicable in horizontal relationships. Indirect application in horizontal relationships is however possible as the courts are placed under a duty to interpret legislation (including private law) in compliance with the HRA so far as this is possible.

S. 2 (1) HRA deals with the relationship of UK courts with the ECtHR. It is their duty to take account of the decisions of the ECtHR when interpreting the Convention. This section has been interpreted narrowly to reflect the so-called mirror principle, expressed by Lord Bingham in Ullah as meaning:

The duty of national courts is to keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence as it evolves over time: no more, but certainly no less.

It follows that UK courts must generally follow the interpretation of the ECtHR.

British courts have no right to invalidate legislation under the HRA. They can only make a declaration of incompatibility where a legislative provision is in violation of the HRA. This stands in contrast to the situation under EU law, under which British courts 30 Southern Bluefin Tuna Case (Australia v Japan; New Zealand v Japan) (Main Proceedings) RIAA XXIII 1.

32 That is the Art 2-12 and 14 ECHR plus its Art 1-3 of Protocol no 1 and Article 1 of Protocol no 13.
33 S. 3 HRA.
35 In exceptional cases, the courts refuse to follow ECtHR decisions, e.g. where the specific features of the common law are not reflected in such decisions, cf. Southern Bluefin Tuna Cases (New Zealand v Japan; Australia v Japan) (Provisional Measures) (1999) 38 ILM 1624 (ITLOS).
36 S. 4 HRA.
must dis-apply conflicting rules of national law where they are in conflict with it. The drafters of the HRA deliberately decided not to go down the same route. Compared with Germany, the protection of fundamental rights, including freedom of religion laid down in Article 9 ECHR, is thus weaker and it is a relatively recent phenomenon.

In contrast to this, the United Kingdom has a long tradition of non-discrimination legislation. As early as 1965, many years before becoming a member of the European Economic Community (now EU), the United Kingdom adopted the Race Relations Act 1965. This was followed by the Equal Pay Act 1970, the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976. Thus the development of anti-discrimination law in the United Kingdom was initially not influenced by Europe. In contrast, the HRA, albeit unrelated to the EU, was very much the consequence of European commitments. Thus the development in the United Kingdom was exactly the opposite to that in Germany where there is a strong catalogue of ‘indigenous’ fundamental rights and where anti-discrimination law was only (reluctantly) adopted by virtue of European law.

The prohibition on belief discrimination in the United Kingdom, however, was only introduced following the Framework Directive with the adoption of the Employment Equality (Religion and Belief) Regulations 2003, which have now been codified, together all other anti-discrimination provisions, in the Equality Act 2010. The Equality Act 2010 contains an over-implementation of the EU Directives mentioned above. First and in contrast to Germany, with gender reassignment and marriage and civil partnership it protects further characteristics. Second, like the German AGG, its scope is wider than that of the Framework Directive and it extends to the provision of goods and services.

c. Conclusion

In conclusion of this brief overview, one can observe considerable differences in tradition and in legal value of the respective rights. Whereas in both countries the national legislation implementing the Equality Directives has the force of European Union law and thus takes primacy over conflicting national law, the protection of religious freedom as a fundamental right differs. In the United Kingdom it is weaker because it is ‘only’ protected by an Act of Parliament, albeit a constitutional Act. In Germany, fundamental rights are constitutional rights, which can be enforced by the constitutional court even against legislation. The two countries’ traditions also differ. Whereas the United Kingdom can be said to have a long-standing anti-discrimination tradition, its fundamental rights provisions have only been in force since 2000. Germany by contrast has a long tradition of giving strong protection to fundamental rights whereas fully-fledged anti-discrimination law only 37 S. 2 European Communities Act 1972 as interpreted in Regina v Secretary of State for Transport, Ex parte Factortame Ltd. and Others (No. 2) [1990] 3 WLR 818, [1991] 1 AC 603 HL.

---

38 Note that the Equality Act does not apply to Northern Ireland.

39 For which there is no implied repeal, cf. Thoburn v Sunderland City Council [2002] EWHC 195 (Admin), para 60 et seq.
appeared as recently as 2006. Despite these differences, very similar provisions apply in Germany and in the United Kingdom. Both countries have implemented the relevant EU equality directives and both countries protect freedom of religion as a fundamental right. One should therefore expect that the outcome of legal proceedings in comparable cases should be the same. However, it will be shown that differences persist. Protection against belief discrimination is stronger than the protection of freedom of religion in the United Kingdom, whereas in Germany belief discrimination law does not seem to have added much to the protection already in existence and is indeed neglected. This paper aims to show that traditional approaches prevail in both legal systems, but that the potential exists for a common European standard in the protection of religious freedom and against belief discrimination.

III. Case study: freedom of religion and belief discrimination

This case study focuses on the case law on freedom of religion and on belief discrimination. It will reveal that there are remarkable differences in the approach to these cases taken by the courts in Germany and in the United Kingdom. It will be argued that these differences are due to a number of factors pertaining to domestic law, e.g. the availability of ‘traditional’ remedies and tactical decisions of parties influenced by established domestic legal regimes. The following discussion will focus on ‘genuine’ cases of religious discrimination. Cases, in which a belief is used as a justification for discrimination by the person holding that belief, do not feature.¹⁰

1. ‘Religion and belief’ a unique characteristic

Religion and belief is a unique characteristic in anti-discrimination law in that it is the only characteristic which has a corresponding human right, freedom of religion. Thus there are many cases which can be argued under both anti-discrimination law and freedom of religion. For instance, a female civil servant may be refused permission to wear a Muslim headscarf at work as this would be in conflict with the state’s duty of neutrality in religious matters. The civil servant can argue that her right to freedom of religion has been infringed. But she could equally argue that she has been discriminated against on the basis of her belief. It would go beyond the remit of this paper to offer a full-blown account of the theoretical relationship between the anti-discrimination provision and freedom of religion. For the purposes of this article it suffices to point out some key differences. First, in order to establish discrimination it is necessary to establish a difference in treatment compared with another person or a group of persons. In particular in the context of indirect discrimination on the basis of religion, a claimant must show that other persons share his specific belief. Otherwise his claim cannot be successfully based on anti-discrimination law.

Yet he may be successful on the basis of religious freedom since it protects individuals even if their belief is sincerely only held by them. It can prove difficult to make such a group comparison in religious discrimination cases. Whereas some characteristics like gender or race rarely pose difficulties in this respect, belief is an entirely subjective matter. Thus it may be difficult for an individual to prove that he is a member of an affected group of people who share the same belief. Second, in religion and belief discrimination cases, the applicant will often seek treatment different to other workers rather than being treated the same. For instance, in the English case of Ladele, the claimant, who was a registrar, sought to be exempt from certain duties regarding civil partnership ceremonies because ‘marriage’ between two people of the same sex was contrary to her Christian belief. Third, religious freedom typically only applies in vertical situations and not in disputes between private parties, unless there is horizontal indirect effect either by virtue of the ECtHR’s doctrine of positive obligations or by virtue of the German concept of Drittwirkung.

3. United Kingdom

a. The relative weakness of religious freedom under Article 9 ECHR

Religious freedom in the United Kingdom is protected by the HRA. As mentioned earlier, the HRA incorporates most of the ECHR into UK law including its Article 9, which stipulates this:

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

2. Freedom to manifest one’s religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

On this basis one can distinguish between the right to hold a belief (forum internum) and the right to manifest one’s belief (forum externum). While the former is an absolute guarantee, the latter is subject to restrictions. When it comes to derogations under Article 9 (2) ECHR, a claimant must first establish that his or her right to freedom of religion has been interfered with. Under the ECtHR’s jurisprudence this will normally be the case where an behaviour can be considered an expression of someone’s belief and where that behaviour is restricted. However, the mere fact that the behaviour was somehow motivated by a belief does not suffice. According to traditional case law, the behaviour must constitute an actual expression of her belief. This can be interpreted as a rather strict stance resulting in the Court only finding behaviour to constitute a manifestation of a belief where it is mandatory for the individual claimant. While in theory this would allow the Court to make judgments on theological questions, it has in practice been quite accommodating. For instance in the cases on the Muslim headscarf it accepted that the wearing of a headscarf is a manifestation of the individual’s faith without much discussion. Also, in its recent decision in Eweida the Court re-affirmed its stance that there would have to be an intimate link to the religion or belief, but at the same time held that the visible wearing of a cross by an employee fell within the scope of Article 9.

42 This was the reason Ms Eweida’s claim failed in the Court of Appeal: Eweida v British Airways Plc [2010] EWCA Civ 80.

A further hurdle for each applicant is the establishment of an interference with his belief. Under its traditional case law, the ECtHR did not consider there to be interference where the applicant had voluntarily submitted herself to a situation which leads to a restriction of the expression of her belief. This is the so-called specific situation or voluntary acceptance rule. A typical example would be an employment situation where the claimant had voluntarily chosen to accept a position and would have a choice to leave the employment in order to comply with her beliefs. But since the late 1990s it seemed that the ECtHR had relaxed its position on the specific situation rule. An example would be the case of Dahlab, where the applicant was a teacher in a Swiss state school who insisted on wearing a Muslim headscarf during lessons. While the Swiss government argued that there was no interference since the applicant would have the choice to leave and teach at a private school, the Court did not address the point at all but rather decided the case on the basis of justification. This implies that the Court had accepted that there was interference 47 Arrowsmith v United Kingdom app no 7050/75, DR 8, 131.

50 Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (7th edn, OUP 2008), para 82.
53 Dahlab v Switzerland.
with her right to freedom of religion. In a similar vein the Grand Chamber of the Court explicitly accepted interference in Leyla Şahin where the applicant was a student at Istanbul University and insisted on wearing a headscarf even though it was effectively banned there.\textsuperscript{54} The recent decision in Eweida and others confirmed this trend. A chamber of the ECtHR explicitly reversed the specific situation rule pointing to the importance of freedom of religion in a democratic society.\textsuperscript{55}

The application of the mirror principle had prompted the UK courts to apply the specific situation rule in the past. In fact, it is suggested that the UK courts’ use of the specific situation rule even went beyond what would have been required under the mirror principle. The leading decision on the question is Begum, which was rendered more than six years prior to the ECtHR’s Eweida decision.\textsuperscript{56} In this case a student at an English secondary school decided to wear a ‘jilbab’\textsuperscript{57} instead of her school uniform. As a consequence she was no longer allowed to attend school unless she wore the school uniform. The school uniform for girls was a shalwar kameeze\textsuperscript{58} and the school uniform policy made additional allowance for Muslim girls by allowing them to wear a headscarf. The applicant argued that her choice of the jilbab was mandated by her belief and that the refusal to allow her to attend school amounted to an exclusion and constituted an unjustifiable interference with her right under Article 9 (2) ECHR. Addressing the question of interference, Lord Bingham, who gave the leading speech in the House of Lords, referred to the ECtHR’s specific situation case law.\textsuperscript{59} From this case law he drew the general conclusion that ‘interference is not easily established’.\textsuperscript{60} In the present case he considered the specific situation rule to be applicable. Lord Bingham referred to the option to attend a different school, the school uniform policy of which would allow the jilbab and concluded that there was no interference.\textsuperscript{61} This reasoning has been rightly criticised as too strict and for extending the specific situation rule to new situations.\textsuperscript{62} In particular, the House of Lords did not give a single reason why the specific situation rule should be extended to pupils.\textsuperscript{63} Furthermore, it neglected the situation of a minor whose ‘acceptance’ of a school uniform policy upon entering the school at the age of twelve can only be fictional as school attendance is mandatory and the school

\textsuperscript{54} Del Vecchio, para 78; a similar approach was taken in the cases of Mox Plant Case (Ireland v United Kingdom) 41 I.L.M. 405 (2002) ITLOS and Volker Röben, ‘The Southern Bluefin Tuna Cases: Re-Regionalization of the Settlement of Law of the Sea Disputes?’ 62 Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht 61.

\textsuperscript{55} Brownlie.

\textsuperscript{56} Prosecutor v Duško Tadić (Appeals Chamber) 38 ILM 1518 (ICTY 15 July 1999).

\textsuperscript{57} A ‘jilbab’ is a long coat-like garment, which conceals the shape of the female body, ibid, para 10.

\textsuperscript{58} A shalwar kameeze is a sleeveless smock-like dress with a square neckline, revealing the wearer’s collar and tie, with the shalwar, loose trousers, tapering at the ankles, ibid, para 6.

\textsuperscript{59} Ibid, para 23

\textsuperscript{60} Ibid, para 24; compare with the seemingly more liberal approach in Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) ICJ Reports 1986, 14 and the criticism of the ECtHR’s case law in Copsey v WWB Devon Clays Ltd EWCA Civ 932.

\textsuperscript{61} Prosecutor v Duško Tadić (Appeals Chamber), para 25.

\textsuperscript{62} Russell Sandberg, Law and Religion (CUP 2011) 91; see also the speeches of Lord Nicholls and Baroness Hale who both expressed their doubts as to the non-existence of an interference.

\textsuperscript{63} Hill, 318.
is picked by the pupil’s parents. This would assume that the religious beliefs of a teenager do not change over time, which is certainly not a given. One can find ample criticism of this approach in particular in view of the difficulties and ‘costs’ which leaving a position of employment or other role, which one has voluntarily accepted, may entail. Furthermore, the approach taken by the UK courts appears to be wider than that of the ECtHR and it does not take into account the relaxation of the ECtHR’s stance on interference which had already manifested itself in Dahlab and Şahin at the time of the Begum decision. Despite this, it should be noted that their Lordships still discussed the question of justification obiter. This can be interpreted in two ways. Either they wanted to express their views on justification in case the applicant decided to file a complaint with the ECtHR. Or their Lordships were not quite so certain about the non-existence of an interference. The case of Begum illustrates how the strict approach taken by the UK courts led to a significant reduction of the scope of Article 9 ECHR.

The reasoning in Begum was then applied in a number of other school cases. In R (on the application of X) v Headteachers and Governors of Y School, for instance, a female student wishing to wear a niqab veil was unsuccessful in her challenge of the ban on this religiously motivated choice of garment because she had been offered a place at another school. Thus Silber J in the High Court concluded, there was no interference with her right under Article 9 ECHR. The most problematic consequence of this approach was that it excluded from the outset the possibility of a balancing of interests, which can only happen at the justification stage, at which point the question of voluntary acceptance can certainly be an important factor. The extension of the rule to cases dealing with underage students is particularly problematic in this regard. One can thus conclude that under the established case law of the courts in the United Kingdom, it is difficult to succeed with claims based on Article 9 ECHR.

b. The relative strength of anti-discrimination law

This weakness in the protection of freedom of religion has prompted applicants to explore the anti-discrimination avenue. Despite the UK’s long tradition of anti-discrimination legislation, belief discrimination was only introduced in the implementation process of the Framework Directive in the Employment Equality (Religion and Belief) Regulations 2003 and was restricted in scope to employment and vocational training. Before 2003 religious

---

64 Mumery LJ in Copsey, para 34; Nicholas Bamforth, Maleiha Malik and Colm O’Cinneide, Discrimination Law: Theory and Context (Sweet & Maxwell 2008) 873-874; EHRC 323 et seq.
65 Dahlab v Switzerland is not mentioned at all and Baroness Hale was the only one to refer to Del Vecchio but only to the dissenting opinion of Judge Tulkens in that case.
67 A niqab veil is a veil which covers the entire face save for the eyes, ibid, para 1.
68 Ibid, para 26 et seq; this approach was also followed in Playfoot (a minor), R (on the application of) v Millais School [2007] EWHC 1698 (Admin); a critical analysis of both decisions can be found in Hill, 320-322.
69 On the likely changes to that case law after the ECtHR’s decision in Eweida, cf. supra.
discrimination could only be argued indirectly in cases where the discrimination also constituted race discrimination, which benefited Sikhs\textsuperscript{70} and Jews\textsuperscript{71} but not other religions.

Only with the Equality Act 2006 was the scope of belief discrimination extended to also cover the provision of ‘goods, facilities and services’\textsuperscript{72}, which remains to be the case after the enactment of the Equality Act 2010. Thus after 2006 the route was open to wider challenges on the basis of anti-discrimination law. It goes (almost) without saying that the interpretation of anti-discrimination law is independent of the constraints of the HRA and the ECtHR’s case law. An important consequence of this development can be seen in the High Court judgment in \textit{Watkins-Singh}.\textsuperscript{73} The applicant, a Sikh girl, insisted on wearing a Kara for religious reasons. A Kara is a steel bangle with a width of about 50 millimetres. This clashed with the no-jewellery policy of her school. An exemption was not granted. The applicant was first educated in complete isolation from other students and later excluded from the school. She then attended a different school, which allowed her to wear the Kara.

The applicant argued \textit{inter alia} that the school’s policy constituted indirect discrimination on the grounds of race as well as religion and belief and that such discrimination was not justified. Under the House of Lords’ case law on Article 9 ECHR, the applicant would not have been successful since an alternative school existed, the school uniform policy regarding jewellery of which was laxer.\textsuperscript{74} Silber J’s judgment is in remarkable contrast to the UK courts’ case law on Article 9 ECHR. First, in assessing whether the applicant has been placed at a particular disadvantage compared with other people who do not share her belief, Silber J considered the argument that such a disadvantage would only exist if she was required by her religion to wear the Kara to be too strict.\textsuperscript{75} Hence Silber J did not adopt an approach parallel to the ECtHR’s on what constitutes a manifestation of a belief.

Furthermore, the High Court in \textit{Watkins Singh} explicitly did not transplant the restrictive stance taken by the House of Lords in \textit{Begum} on interference to non-discrimination law. The fact that she had the choice to study at another school was of no relevance for the assessment. The specific situation rule is thus not applicable in the discrimination context. In considering whether the indirect discrimination could be justified, Silber J considered the fact that the Kara was not as ostentatious as the religious dress which was at issue in \textit{Begum, X v Y School} and \textit{Playfoot}.\textsuperscript{76} He also pointed out that instead

\textsuperscript{70} Mandla (Sewa Singh) v Dowell Lee [1982] UKHL 7
\textsuperscript{71} R (on the application of E) v JFS Governing Body.
\textsuperscript{72} Article 46 Equality Act 2006.
\textsuperscript{73} \textit{Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro) ICJ Reports 2007, 43.}
\textsuperscript{74} She did in fact attend such a school after having been expelled.
\textsuperscript{75} \textit{Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), para 51; of course the question whether an indirectly discriminatory measure affects the core of a person’s belief or merely inconveniences them in expressing a certain personal preference may be of relevance at the justification stage, cf. Eweida, para 37.}
\textsuperscript{76} \textit{Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), para 77; this distinction is somewhat artificial as it is irrelevant here: those cases were based on Article 9 whereas Watkins-Singh is based on the Equality Act 2006.}
of refusing the claimant the right to wear the Kara, the school should have made sure that other students understood its significance and would tolerate and accept the claimant’s decision to wear it. Thus the ban on the kara was not considered justified. The fact that the claimant could attend another school did not feature in the judge’s reasoning.

Overall the case of Watkins-Singh reveals a less strict approach regarding claims based on anti-discrimination law compared with claims based on freedom of religion. This can be explained first and foremost by the House Lords’ narrow interpretation of the Strasbourg case law on the question of interference. Second, it seems that the long-standing tradition of anti-discrimination legislation and case law in the United Kingdom has led to a deep understanding of the underlying doctrine and principles with which the High Court did not seem to struggle. In contrast, claims based on the HRA still appear to be somewhat ‘new’. The route successfully taken in Watkins-Singh has been confirmed in other judgments, in particular by Employment Tribunals on working hours which conflicted with employee’s religious commitments and rules on religious dress. Even in cases which were unsuccessful for the claimant, the courts did not transplant the House of Lords’ restrictive specific situation rule to the discrimination context. Rather the cases failed either because indirect discrimination was justified or because no such discrimination could be shown.

However, the Court of Appeal case of Eweida shows that indirect discrimination is not a full substitute for freedom of religion. Its main weakness is the requirement of a group disadvantage. The Court of Appeal did not agree with the claimant that she had been indirectly discriminated against by her employer, who banned her from visibly wearing a cross with her British Airways uniform since she could not show that other people would be similarly disadvantaged by the ban. The definition of indirect discrimination in the Equality Act 2010 requires that ‘persons with whom [the claimant] shares the characteristic’ are put at a particular disadvantage. The Court of Appeal held that it could not be established that a group of Christians existed which considered that they had to wear a cross around their neck for religious reasons, so that no indirect discrimination had taken place. This shows that the law on indirect discrimination on the basis of religion does not protect any subjectively held belief as does the ECHR, under which official doctrines are of less 77 Ibid, para 85.

78 Williams-Drabble v Pathway Care Solutions ET case 2601718/04; Fugler v Macmillan London Hair Studios ET case 2205090/04; Noah v Sarah Desrosiers ET case no 2201867/07; Loizidou v Turkey (Preliminary Objections) (1995) Series A no 310; a detailed analysis can be found in Sandberg, 109-110.
80 Eweida; Chaplin v Royal Devon & Exeter Hospital NHS Foundation Trust ET case no 1702886/09; Guillaume; McFarlane v Relate Avon Ltd [2010] EWCA Civ 880; for a critical analysis of the latter two decisions, cf. Sandberg, 111.
81 Supra.
83 The Court of Appeal’s reasoning here assumes that Eweida considered the wearing of the cross a religious duty.
84 Eweida, paras 12-19.
relevance than the individual belief of the person concerned. But because of the specific situation rule, Eweida was unable to rely on Article 9 ECHR either. One consequence of the approach in Eweida was, as Sandberg observed, that it led to beliefs outside the mainstream being less well protected than those within. In conclusion, a potential claimant in the United Kingdom would thus have been well-advised to pursue the non-discrimination law route rather than the Art 9 route. As Sandberg has argued, the restrictive stance by UK courts on Article 9 left it of little use.

3. Germany

a. strong protection of freedom of religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed as a fundamental right in Art 4 (1) and (2) GG:

(1) Freedom of faith and of conscience, and freedom to profess a religious or philosophical creed, shall be inviolable.

(2) The undisturbed practice of religion shall be guaranteed.

According to the FCC, Article 4 not only protects the (inner) freedom to belief or not to belief (forum internum), but also the external freedom, to manifest that belief, to confess to it and to spread it (forum externum). It encompasses a right to align one’s whole life to one’s belief and to act in accordance with one’s religious convictions. This includes not only imperative demands but also decisions based on religious convictions even where there are no compelling requirements of faith but where it is the individual’s religious conviction that a certain course of action is the best and most appropriate way of dealing with a situation. Compared with the ECtHR, the FCC’s understanding of religious manifestations is therefore wider as it not only covers those manifestations which are an actual expression of a person’s belief. The FCC’s rather wide view would not allow for a restrictive reading such as the specific situation rule. Freedom of religion under the Basic Law is engaged even where an individual voluntarily entered into a situation and it is interfered with where the individual’s right to either hold a belief or to manifest it in the described manner is restricted. The possibility of voluntarily avoiding the infringement by no longer subjecting oneself to a

86 Russell Sandberg, ‘A Uniform Approach to Religious Discrimination? The Position of Teachers and Other School Staff in the UK’ in Myriam Hunter-Henin (ed), Law, Religious Freedoms and Education in Europe (Ashgate 2012) 327, 341; there was some criticism that the UK’s implementing legislation on the definition of indirect discrimination was not in accordance with the Framework Directive
87 Sandberg, Law and Religion 108; this is echoed by Bamforth, Malik and O’Cinneide, 874; confirmed by the successful outcome of Noah v Sarah Desrosiers.
88 Sandberg, Law and Religion 116.
90 BVerfGE 32, 98 (Gesundbeter) 106-107.
91 Cf. LAG Hamm 5 Sa 1782/01, para 23; if when signing an employment contract an employee knows that the duties arising under that contract will collide with their religious duties, an employee’s right to freedom of religion will not allow him to refuse performance of certain duties, cf. LAG Düsseldorf 7 Sa 581/62, Betriebsberater 1964, 597.
situation would be considered as a question of proportionality when assessing the justification of an infringement. This is evident from the FCC’s decision on ritual slaughter involving a Muslim butcher. German law bans the slaughter of warm-blooded animals without prior stunning. Exceptions were possible where a religion prescribed that the slaughter had to happen in a particular way or where the consumption of meat of animals which had not been slaughtered in that manner was forbidden by their religion. However, the authorities did not grant an exception in this case. The FCC held this to violate the butcher’s freedom of occupation coupled with his freedom of religion. Even if the actual slaughter did not constitute a religious ritual and was thus religiously neutral, a ban would also affect the butcher’s customers whose decision to buy such meat was religiously motivated. The FCC considered the argument by the Federal Administrative Court in similar proceedings that the customers also had the choice not to eat meat as unacceptable given the carnivorous eating habits in Germany. In addition, the butcher did not need to restrict himself to selling imported meat. The decision thus stands in marked contrast to the ECHR’s decision in Cha’are Shalom ve Tsedek v. France where the ECHR expressly referred to the possibility of importing meat slaughtered in a ritual manner from another country as a reason for concluding that a ban on a particular method of kosher slaughter did not constitute an interference with freedom of religion. This shows that the protection of freedom of religion under the German Basic Law is more comprehensive than what the ECHR provides. But despite the wording of Article 4 GG, which does not contain an express derogation provision, freedom of religion under the Basic Law is not limitless. Conflicting constitutional principles, e.g. the fundamental rights of others, constitute limits to Article 4 GG. Conflicts must be resolved in accordance with constitutional values and any interference on this basis must be proportionate.

Like in the UK, religious dress has led to ample controversy in Germany. The most prominent case is that of Ludin where the claimant was a qualified teacher seeking employment in a state school. Most teachers in German state schools have the status of civil servant, which is a public office. Article 33 (2) GG provides that access to a public office is based on a candidate’s aptitude, qualifications and professional achievements. The provision aims at a meritocratic process, which is chiefly based on the results achieved in university and teacher training examinations. Ludin was one of the best of her year and would normally have been employed as a primary school teacher had it not been for her insistence on wearing a headscarf during work. The school authority refused to employ her for that reason as she was considered inept for public office. It argued that the state was under a duty to be neutral in religious matters so that a teacher, who is a representative of 92 BVerfGE 104, 337 (Schächten); confirmed in BVerfG, 1 BvR 2284/95.

---

94 Ibid, 350.
96 Gesundbeter 108.
97 Ibid.
the state, must be neutral too. Her constitutional complaint to the FCC was successful. However, the reasoning relied on a formality. The relevant administrative decision did not have a basis in legislation which would have been necessary given the interference with an important fundamental right. This meant that the state legislature in question was able to ‘fix the problem’ by adopting legislation stipulating that religious symbols would be banned in schools in order to ensure that the state’s neutrality in religious matters would be preserved. According to the FCC, such restriction might in particular be justified because of potentially conflicting interests of pupils not sharing her belief, whose negative religious freedom might be affected, and the right of parents to bring up their children according to their own beliefs. As a consequence of this decision, some of the German states adopted rules effectively preventing teachers from wearing a headscarf. Challenges to these rules have hitherto been unsuccessful. However, two cases are currently pending before the FCC, in which the compatibility of these rules with the GG is questioned.

A certain degree of protection of religious freedom also exists in employment law and is particularly ensured by the rules on the protection against dismissal. This became evident in a 2002 case concerning a sales assistant at the perfume counter of a department store who decided to start wearing a headscarf while working. The employer requested that she work without a headscarf, which she refused. As a consequence the employer terminated the employment with immediate effect stating that she was unfit to work in the department store since the store had a policy of not employing women who covered their heads, as this was unacceptable for the customers. In contrast to the Ludin case, the work relationship in question was governed by private law. Under German labour law, dismissal must be ‘socially justified’, which means that there has to be a reason for the dismissal, e.g. the employee’s behaviour. Another valid reason is a characteristic of the employee, which makes her unfit to perform her duties, e.g. chronic illness. This was the argument relied upon by the employer who argued that because the claimant insisted on wearing a headscarf she was unable to work as a sales assistant so that she would have to be dismissed. The Federal Labour Court disagreed with this argument and held that the employee was still capable of performing her duties as a sales assistant. Furthermore, her refusal to remove the headscarf during work could not justify dismissal on the basis of her behaviour. This would only be possible if the employer had exercised his right to direct workers proportionately. When giving instructions to employees the employer must take into account their freedom of religion under Article 4 (1) and (2) GG.

---

99 Ibid, 299 et seq; a more detailed discussion of this decision can be found in Tobias Lock, ‘Of Crucifixes and Headscarves: Religious Symbols in German Schools’ in Myriam Hunter-Henin (ed), Law, Religious Freedoms and Education in Europe (Ashgate 2012) 347, 356.
100 Lock, 361-363.
101 1 BvR 471/10 and 1 BvR 1181/10.
102 QUOTE!
103 § 1 Kündigungsschutzgesetz (Act for the protection against dismissal).
This type of reasoning by the Federal Labour Court is an example of the indirect horizontal effect, which the fundamental right to freedom of religion has in the German legal order. By using this ‘trick’, German labour law was able to protect the belief of the employee even though it was invoked with regard to a private law contract. This line of reasoning has since been confirmed inter alia in a case concerning a Muslim sales assistant who refused to handle alcoholic products while working in a supermarket. The Federal Labour Court held, relying on a similar reasoning to that in the headscarf case, that the refusal could not justify dismissal since the employer’s instructions to handle alcohol had been disproportionate because they had not taken into account the claimant’s religious convictions. The Federal Labour Court left open whether the claimant was still fit to work for the employer because the facts had not yet been established. It explicitly stated, however, that if it proved to be impossible for the employer to accommodate the employee, the dismissal might be justified for this reason. This would chiefly depend on whether it was possible to devise a work schedule which would avoid the employee in question having to handle alcoholic products.

In neither labour law case did the Federal Labour Court mention the possibility of the employee having voluntarily subjected themselves to the employment or that the employee had the option to leave employment. This confirms the earlier analysis that under German law the question of voluntariness is of no relevance regarding the question of interference with freedom of religion, which stands in marked contrast to the UK courts’ attitude.

b. The neglected role of anti-discrimination law

Discrimination on the grounds of religion and belief has thus far not featured prominently in the courts in Germany. Most cases have so far arisen in the sector of employment law and in particular with regard to religious dress. Of the cases which have been brought, many were unsuccessful. In these cases the introduction of anti-discrimination legislation has not had a palpable impact on the decision-making by courts. But there are a handful of cases where the AGG has made a difference and which might herald a change in the initially sceptical attitude by the German courts regarding non-discrimination cases towards a more welcoming approach.

Many cases relating to religious discrimination which came before the courts would have been resolved in the same manner before the AGG entered into force. Interestingly, many decisions, where evidently the AGG would have provided a cause of action, do not feature it at all. For instance in a case concerning the right of a Muslim pupil to pray in his school in public, no anti-discrimination argument appears to have been made. Rather, the case was only decided on the basis of freedom of religion, the infringement with which was held to have been justified. The courts based their decisions chiefly on the established

---

104 BAG 2 AZR 636/09.
105 BVerwG 6 C 20/10.
legal principles described in the previous section. But even where claimants based their cases on the AGG, the labour courts were often dismissive. A number of these cases related to headscarves worn by teachers, social workers and kindergarten teachers. Since the Ludin decision, several states had adopted legislation banning all religious symbols worn by teachers in schools, which includes the headscarf. The applicants in the cases discussed here argued that the legislation in question was not in compliance with Article 4 GG and also violated the AGG. In all cases the courts discussed the Article 4 GG issue in quite some detail concluding that the legislation in question was compliant with it to protect the neutrality of the state, the pupils’ own religious freedom and the freedom of the parents to bring up their children according to their own belief. When examining the decisions on the question of whether a ban on the headscarf was contrary to anti-discrimination law, one can witness a parallelism in interpretation. In the headscarf cases the courts relied upon the justificatory exception of a genuine occupational requirement, which necessitated the discriminatory rule. In carrying out the proportionality test necessary under this exception the Federal Labour Court merely referred to its reasoning on the constitutionality of the legislation banning religious symbols. No separate proportionality test was carried out. The same parallelism of argument can be witnessed in the case mentioned above concerning the Muslim employee who refused to handle alcohol at work. It is recalled that in such purely private law employment relationships fundamental rights are not directly applicable. The Federal Labour Court had held that it could not be excluded that the employee might be unfit to perform the duties of an employee in a supermarket and could therefore be dismissed. The same reasoning was employed when the Court addressed the question whether an indirect discrimination might be justified. Hence in those cases, the introduction of anti-discrimination legislation has not led to a different outcome.

In addition to sometimes ignoring anti-discrimination law, some decisions of German courts reveal an insecurity in handling discrimination cases. This is demonstrated in a decision of the Berlin Labour Court, which concerned an applicant for a position who had previously worked for the Stasi (the GDR’s Ministry for State Security, which was a repressive secret police). She claimed that she had been denied the position because of her belief in Marxism-Leninism. The court accepted that Marxism-Leninism was a belief, which came within the scope of the AGG. But it is remarkable that the court did not resolve the case on the basis of justification, which would have been appropriate given that the applicant had previously worked in the same company as a temporary worker and that her former employment with the Stasi had led to tensions among the workforce. Instead, the 106 For details cf. Lock, 361.

---

107 BAG 2 AZR 499/08, para 19-25; BAG 2 AZR 55/09, para 21-26; BAG 2 AZR 593/09, para 26-34.
109 BAG 2 AZR 499/08, para 28; BAG 2 AZR 55/09, para 29; BAG 2 AZR 593/09, para 46.
110 Interestingly, the Court did not think that the dismissal was indirectly discriminatory.
111 ArbG Berlin 33 Ca 5772/09.
112 The German term found in both the Directive and the AGG is “Weltanschauung”, which denotes a philosophy of life.
court argued that there was no indirect discrimination in the first place because the applicant was not in a position comparable to that of other potential applicants as they would not share her belief. The court’s decision reveals a profound confusion.\textsuperscript{113} What the labour court was essentially arguing was that for indirect discrimination to arise there would have to be unequal treatment between two potential applicants who share the same characteristics as the claimant. Yet the court should have asked the question whether the applicant was treated differently because she belonged to a group of potential applicants who believed in Marxism-Leninism.

Another example for a confused application of anti-discrimination law is a case which arose in the state of Bavaria and concerned an allegedly discriminatory advertisement for a so-called ‘Concordat chair’ at a university. Concordat chairs were established on the basis of the 1924 Concordat between the Holy See and Bavaria. Where appointment to such a chair is made, a Catholic bishop has a right to veto the appointment. The advertisement was explicitly for a ‘Concordat chair’ and the applicants argued that this was in violation of the AGG. They applied for provisional measures, which the Bavarian Higher Administrative Court was unable to grant for procedural reasons. It hinted that the advertisement might not have been compliant with the AGG.\textsuperscript{114} In the main proceedings, however, the court left the question open whether the bishop’s veto right was in compliance with the AGG since neither applicant had been selected and the veto right only applied after selection.\textsuperscript{115} This distinction is not convincing. The fact that the veto can only be exercised after a candidate has been selected does not remove the discrimination as the selection process itself is tainted by the imminent veto of the bishop, which he is certain to exercise where a chosen candidate is not a Catholic. Hence in the eyes of this author, a refusal, binding on the appointing minister, by the bishop to appoint a candidate because of their religious background constitutes direct discrimination and is not justifiable under the religious ethos exception.\textsuperscript{116} The ‘Concordat chairs’ are not theology chairs, where the ethos exception might apply, but chairs of philosophy, history and pedagogics.

Despite these examples of poor understanding of the anti-discrimination law, there are two cases which show that the ban on religious discrimination under the AGG has produced new remedies in Germany. In these cases there would not have existed a remedy before the entry into force of the AGG. In one case similar to the one on the concordat chair, a job advertisement for a position with a pension scheme for people employed by the Lutheran church stipulated a requirement that the applicant be a member of a Christian \textsuperscript{113} The Berlin Labour Court (correctly) also pointed out that the actual reason for the defendant’s refusal to employ her was not so much the fact that she may have been a Marxist but the fact that she had worked for the Stasi.

\textsuperscript{114} BayVGH 7 CE 09.661 and 7 CE 09.662, para 34.

\textsuperscript{115} BayVGH 7 ZB 11.2606.

\textsuperscript{116} § 9 AGG implementing Art 4 (2) Framework Directive.
church. The deciding court found that the religious ethos exception did not apply because the pension scheme did not perform any duties related to the church’s Christian ethos.

The other case, which might indicate a change in attitude towards the AGG and a heightened awareness of the remedies it provides dealt with a claim by a young woman who had been refused employment as a trainee dental assistant because she made it clear that she would have to wear a headscarf during work. The Berlin Labour Court found indirect discrimination and did not accept the dentist’s arguments relating to health and safety or his desire for dental assistants to wear uniform clothing. The Labour Court therefore awarded the claimant compensation for non-pecuniary damage suffered.

This survey of the case law has revealed that initially not much changed since the entry into force of the AGG. Most cases were resolved on the basis of doctrine applicable before 2006. Arguments based on the AGG are usually dismissed with the same reasoning as arguments based on ‘traditional’ labour law. This author was only able to identify two cases where the AGG has had an impact. In both cases an employment contract had not yet been concluded and the applicant had been denied a position based on their religion. The relative unimportance of the AGG in German case law with a religious discrimination angle has two main reasons. The first is that, in contrast to the UK, stronger protection on the basis of freedom of religion was already in place before the entry into force of the AGG. The second reason is that both courts and counsel do not appear to be comfortable deciding traditional labour law disputes on this basis. In addition, one can witness that multiple discrimination does not feature in the case law. Many cases, in particular those dealing with the headscarf, would have lent themselves to arguments of indirect sex discrimination and indirect race discrimination but these finer points of anti-discrimination law seem to have escaped the parties and the courts.

4. Comparative analysis and possible explanations

The preceding survey of British and German case law has revealed a profound difference in the approaches taken by the national courts. While in the United Kingdom a claim has hitherto been far more likely to be successful on the basis of anti-discrimination law, in Germany there is only little evidence for the success of this remedy. Rather, a successful 117 LAG Hessen 3 Sa 742/10; another, similar, case failed because the applicant did not have the necessary qualifications for the position advertised so that she could not establish indirect discrimination, BAG 8 AZR 466/09.

118 David A. Colson and Peggy Hoyle, ‘Satisfying the Procedural Prerequisites to the Compulsory Dispute Settlement Mechanisms of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention: Did the Southern Bluefin Tuna Tribunal Get It Right?’ 34 Ocean Development & International Law 59.
119 Supra.
German case is usually decided on the basis of freedom of religion. The following paragraphs are an attempt to provide an explanation for this divergence.

One possible explanation can be found in the difference in relative legal value of anti-discrimination law provisions in Germany and the UK. As explained above, the HRA, which protects freedom of religion, is of a lower normative rank than the Equality Act 2010 as far as that Act implements the various EU Directives. Where a conflict is found between an Act of Parliament and freedom of religion, the most a UK court can do is issue a declaration of incompatibility whereas a conflict between the Equality Act 2010 and a piece of legislation allows the court to disapply that legislation. However, there is no evidence in the case law of the UK courts that such thinking informs their decision making. In addition, no case has thus far arisen where an Act of Parliament was in conflict with either the Equality Act 2010 or Article 9 HRA. By contrast, in the German context this argument might be applicable. While every German court, by virtue of the principle of supremacy, is obliged to disapply any legislation conflicting with the requirements of the EU Directives, the FCC has even greater powers when it comes to conflicts with Article 4 GG in that it may annul conflicting legislation. This is coupled with a lack of jurisdiction of the FCC over anti-discrimination law because a case before it must be exclusively argued on the basis of the Basic Law. This means that a claimant is well-advised to argue the case under Article 4 GG as well as anti-discrimination law. Otherwise, recourse to the FCC might be barred.

Another possible explanation would be tradition. The UK has a longer tradition of anti-discrimination law than Germany and Germany has a longer tradition of human rights review than the UK. The findings of the above case study show that this tradition is reflected in the outcome of cases in both countries. Whereas the impact of anti-discrimination law on the outcome of German cases has hitherto been small, its impact in UK law has been a lot greater. This is coupled with a degree of scepticism towards anti-discrimination law in Germany, which is seen by many as an interference with the constitutionally guaranteed concept of private autonomy, which entails freedom of contract. But this alone may be too superficial an explanation. After all, in other areas of anti-discrimination law, there has been a surge of case law in Germany and many cases have been successful. This is particularly true for cases on age discrimination. The same is true for the UK, which since the entry into force of the HRA has experienced a human rights revolution.

---

121 Cf. some of the reactions to the Mangold decision.
122 German courts have been very active in requesting preliminary references in age discrimination cases, e.g. in the following cases: Gender Directive; Recast Directive; Race Directive; Framework Directive; C-555/07 Kücükdeveci v Swedex GmbH & Co. KG [2010] ECR I-365; Case C-144/04 Mangold v Helm [2005] ECR I-9981; Finke;Case 43/75 Defrenne v Sabena [1976] ECR 455/Treves.
The most important reason in the eyes of this author are thus differences in the set-up of the legal system in the two countries. The main reason for the weakness in the protection of religious freedom in the UK is the mirror principle, which forces UK courts to follow the case law of the ECtHR. Because of the mirror principle, the UK courts have so far applied the ECtHR’s specific situation rule in cases argued on the basis of religious freedom leaving claimants with little protection. In contrast, German courts are not confined to basing their decisions on the ECHR as interpreted by the ECtHR. They must (also) apply the more far-reaching Article 4 GG. For them, this reduces the need to rely on anti-discrimination law in many cases. Furthermore, the tactical considerations referred to above are important. Applicants can only invoke fundamental rights guaranteed in the Basic Law before the FCC. In addition, the main points of reference for the lower courts are the Basic Law and the FCC’s case law. This is coupled with a lack of pertinent case law by the ECJ, which has famously not decided a single belief discrimination case. These differences in the respective legal orders are compounded by a lack of consensus as to how religious practices of minority religions should be accommodated. The protection of minority religions is a highly controversial topic in most European societies. The legal frameworks differ considerably and so does the relationship between church and state, which is often historically determined. This seems to confirm O’Cinneide’s more general argument that there is no evidence of a deeper European consensus underlying European equality law.

This lack of consensus thus becomes evident in judicial practice.

IV. Conclusion: Towards a common approach?

Having sketched out the main tendencies in British and German case law, it is time to return to the question whether there is a trend towards a common EU-wide approach? The comparative analysis shows that there are still considerable differences in the approaches taken by the courts in the United Kingdom and Germany. Thus the question is whether the success of earlier anti-discrimination provisions, such as those on sex discrimination, can be replicated with newer characteristics such as religion and belief. A similar development is currently taking place in age-discrimination cases, where the ECJ is currently very active. In other words, it seems appropriate to try and gauge the potential for the convergence of standards in this area towards a common European approach in the Member States.

After all, most of the provisions on religious freedom or religious discrimination have European roots and are under the supervision of at least one of the European courts. Yet one needs to be conscious of the limits to such common development. First, the ECtHR often accords Member States a margin of appreciation in cases based on Article 9 ECHR.

---

124 O’Cinneide 11.
125 Ibid.
126 E.g. in Connolly, para 68 et seq.; Dahlab v Switzerland; Del Vecchio, para 109 et seq.; interestingly in Brownlie the ECtHR held with regard to Eweida’s case that the state had exceeded its margin of appreciation, ibid, para 94; on the margin of appreciation in general cf. George Letsas, A Theory of Interpretation of the European Convention on Human Rights (OUP 2007) 80.
This is because the relationship between state and religion differs considerably from country to country, with e.g. France opting for strict secularism (laïcité) and countries with a state religion like Denmark so that there is no European consensus on these issues. Based on the notion of subsidiarity, the margin of appreciation doctrine allows the respondent state concerned to exercise a degree of discretion when it comes to restricting freedom of religion under the Convention, which is free from the scrutiny of the ECtHR. Nonetheless, the ECtHR is adamant that the margin of appreciation is under European supervision, but in the past the Court has been reluctant to find a respondent state to have exceeded that margin. Only in the recent case of Eweida did the Court reach such a finding with regard to the first of four applicants. A more activist approach such as this cannot therefore be completely ruled out. But given the sensitivities involved in cases dealing with freedom of religion and taking into account the Court’s reluctance to find violations of Article 9 ECHR in the past, it seems unlikely that it will make a significant contribution towards a common approach on the balancing of divergent interests.

Second, the jurisdiction of the ECJ has its limits, too. Potential cases dealing with belief discrimination are likely to reach the ECJ as preliminary references from national courts under Article 267 TFEU. While the ECJ does not operate a margin of appreciation doctrine, it conceptualises its relationship with national courts as one of cooperation, leaving the application of the facts of the case to them. It follows from this relationship that in theory the ECJ does not carry out a proportionality test of its own because it is its role to interpret EU law and not to apply it. Yet there is ample evidence in case law where the ECJ conducted the proportionality exercise itself. In a similar vein, the ECJ does not normally make an assessment as regards the objective justification for indirect discrimination. Again, it is normally for the national courts to come to a conclusion on these points. But there are cases in which the ECJ provided national courts with detailed guidelines on which factors could be taken into account. There is no clear pattern as to when the ECJ engages in a proportionality review of its own and it is therefore impossible to predict how the ECJ would deal with cases alleging discrimination on the basis of religion. On the one hand past case law shows that the ECJ has had the courage to decide detailed questions of proportionality in anti-discrimination law, in particular in the field of sex discrimination. On the other hand, its case law shows a reluctance to decide questions 129 E.g. in the anti-discrimination context in Eric Barendt, An Introduction to Constititutional Law (OUP 1998), para 23-29; Dicey, para 41 et seq; for further examples regarding free movement law, cf. Paul Craig, EU Administrative Law (2nd edn, OUP 2012) 617-622.

130 Thoburn v Sunderland City Council, para 36.
131 E.g. R (on the application of E) v JFS Governing Body, para 15; Hall and Preddy v Bull Case no 9BS02095 Bristol County Court, para 14.
132 For explanations cf. Craig, 629 et seq.
133 E.g. Barendt; Dicey.
touching on deeply enshrined national constitutional values. For instance in Omega, the ECJ respected an argument made by Germany based on its constitutional concept of human dignity thereby allowing Germany to restrict the Omega’s freedom to provide services under what is now Article 56 TFEU. When it comes to potential cases of belief discrimination, the national rules at stake might be influenced by domestic constitutional values of similar importance to human dignity in Germany. In particular state-church relationships tend to be of such quality, for instance the principle of laïcité in France. Thus while the ECJ was rather willing to carry out a proportionality test in its earlier anti-discrimination case law, it has equally shown a degree of sensitivity for important constitutional values.

Conscious of these limits, one can identify three fields in which an alignment of the case law, if not convergence, has the potential to occur. First, it is clear that there is still potential in the German courts to improve their understanding of anti-discrimination law in general. This is likely to occur over time with an increase in ECJ case law on these questions. In particular, German courts have yet to develop an approach towards multiple discrimination, which so far has not featured in cases concerning discrimination on the basis of religion. From the latest case law of German courts one can already infer that they seem to become more comfortable with anti-discrimination law. For instance in the case mentioned above concerning a dental assistant who was dismissed for wearing a headscarf during work, the Berlin Labour Court based its decision solely on anti-discrimination law. In contrast to decisions by other German courts, it did not resort to established causes of action but applied the ‘new’ remedy laid down in the AGG instead.

Second, the courts in the United Kingdom are likely to follow the ECtHR’s reversal of the specific situation rule in Eweida. Hence one can expect the strengthening of Article 9 ECHR to be replicated in British law. This would mean that cases such as Begum concerning religious dress and religious symbols will have to be resolved on the basis of whether a rule restricting them was proportionate.

The third area with the potential for convergence is proportionality. As already pointed out, there are procedural constraints on a common European development in both the EU and the ECHR legal order. Recent academic discussion has revolved around the introduction of a reasonable accommodation doctrine when it comes to freedom of religion and belief discrimination. The proportionality exercise for justifying indirect belief discrimination or interference with freedom of religion is the same in both cases. The concept of reasonable accommodation exists in European law only with regard to disability discrimination. According to Art. 5 of the Framework Directive the employer is under a duty to take appropriate measures to accommodate a person with a disability in the employment context. It has been argued that in the context of belief discrimination a similar duty ought to be introduced as the situation of a disabled person and a person with a belief were similar.134 It is argued that belief discrimination is similar in that in both cases the discrimination does not normally relate to the characteristic as such but to its effects. A disabled person may not be able to work in a specific work environment, so that the employer must adapt the environment. The same is often true for religious discrimination where the effects of the employee’s religious convictions (e.g. not being allowed to work on certain days of the week) clash with the employer’s policies or practices. For this reason, it is argued that the employer’s effort, or lack thereof, to provide reasonable accommodation should inform the proportionality test. Reasonable accommodation has its origin in the United States Civil Rights Act 1964. That legislation requires that the employer must demonstrate ‘that he is unable to reasonably accommodate to an employee’s or prospective employee’s religious observance or practice without undue hardship on the conduct of the employer’s business.’ Thus the introduction of a duty to accommodate an employee would shift the burden onto the employer. The employer would have to show that they were unable to accommodate the employee. The question of whether an employee can be accommodated has already been an important consideration in some of the decisions mentioned in this article. But reasonable accommodation has so far not been formally introduced. It would go beyond the remit of this paper to discuss the vices and virtues of the reasonable accommodation doctrine. But it could be argued that reasonable accommodation could make the proportionality test more rational and provide fixed guidelines. The question, however is whether in view of the limits to the European courts’ jurisdictions such a development is likely to occur in the absence of a change in legislation. In this context one should point to the ECtHR’s decision in Eweida, in which reasonable accommodation had been explicitly referred to by some of the interveners, but the Court itself remained silent on it. This suggests that it did not wish to introduce this concept as a doctrine in the law of the ECHR. Equally, it is unlikely that the ECJ will introduce reasonable accommodation of its own accord. Even in the absence of legislation, a progressive interpretation of proportionality can result in a de facto duty to accommodate. In particular with regard to the fact that reasonable accommodation has been explicitly legislated for in for the area of disability discrimination, it would be rather brave for the ECJ to extent this concept to other characteristics in the absence of a change in the Directive itself. This confirms the above assumption that it is unlikely that one of the two European courts will introduce a sophisticated proportionality test.

---

135 Connolly, 73.
137 Vickers, 185 et seq; a similar duty exists in Canada, ibid, 198.
138 For this cf. the discussions by Alidadi; Vickers; Lisa Waddington, ‘Reasonable Accommodation: Time to Extend the Duty to Accommodate Beyond Disability?’ (2011) 36 NTM/NJCM-Bulletin.
139 Brownlie, para 78.
140 Waddington, 192.
141 Such a change is unlikely: cf. EU Commission’s proposals to complete the equality framework: fails to mention reasonable accommodation as a way of doing so, COM(2008) 420 final
At the same time it is only a matter of time until a national court will make a reference to the ECJ on belief discrimination. There is evidence that pressure groups are making suggestions to that effect to national courts. For instance in a headscarf case currently pending before the German Federal Constitutional Court, the Open Society Institute suggested just that in an amicus curiae brief.\(^\text{142}\) It is unlikely that the FCC will follow this suggestion in the cases before it, but the amicus curiae brief shows that pressure groups have identified the issue and are keen to involve the ECJ in the discussion.

In addition to these three specific fields in which developments may occur, there is one great unknown: the EU’s Charter of Fundamental Rights. It is obvious that the Charter gives the ECJ a potent tool for the development of a common human rights standard throughout the European Union. But neither its applicability within the Member States’ legal orders nor its substantive content have been fully determined yet.