The procedure of Demosthenes’ against Leptines

Citation for published version:

Link:
Link to publication record in Edinburgh Research Explorer

Document Version:
Peer reviewed version

Published In:
Journal of Hellenic Studies

Publisher Rights Statement:
© The procedure of Demosthenes’ Against Leptines: how to repeal (and replace) an existing law. / Canevaro, Mirko.

General rights
Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Edinburgh Research Explorer is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy
The University of Edinburgh has made every reasonable effort to ensure that Edinburgh Research Explorer content complies with UK legislation. If you believe that the public display of this file breaches copyright please contact openaccess@ed.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.
The Procedure of Demosthenes’ Against Leptines:

How to Repeal (and Replace) an Existing Law

1. Introduction: the procedure of the Against Leptines

In 355/4 an Athenian named Apsephion brought a public action to repeal an inexpedient law (γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θείναυ). The prosecution was aimed at a law enacted by Leptines in 356/5, which abolished all exemptions from liturgies except those granted to the tyrannicides. The charge was against the law, not against Leptines, who was no longer subject to prosecution because more than a year had elapsed since his law was enacted (§144). At the trial, Demosthenes delivered his speech as a supporting speaker (synegoros). Phormion also participated on Apsephion’s side as a synegoros. Before the case came to trial, Phormion, Apsephion and Demosthenes proposed a law to replace Leptines’ law. This replacement law proposed to institute a public action (γραφή) that could be brought against anyone who had received an honour in the past and was no longer considered worthy to retain it. As with all public actions, the decision about this issue would be made by a panel of judges in a lawcourt. In his speech at the trial, Demosthenes states that his ultimate 1 I want to thank Edward Harris for his generous help and advice on this article, and the readers of JHS for useful feedback and suggestions.

---

2 This is clearly indicated by the use of οὐκ ἐπιτήδειον associated with Leptines’ law, cf. §§83, 88, 95, 153. Cf. also §1: εἶναι τοῦ νομίζειν συμφέρειν τῇ πόλει λελύσθαι τὸν νόμον.
3 Demosthenes throughout the speech seems to imply that only honorary exemptions were abolished, yet at Dem. 20.29-50 he gives the impression that the law cancelled also exemptions from custom duties and commercial taxes (cfr. MacDowell [2004] and Canevaro-Rutter [2015] 13-18). The citations of Leptines’ law make clear that all exemptions from liturgies were involved.
5 At §§88, 97-8 and 137 Demosthenes does not restrict the range of application of this law to exemptions, so it is possible that it was intended to be available to rescind any honour, not only ἀτέλεια. Unlike the γραφή παρανόμων, which was brought against the proposer of the honours, this γραφή was meant to be brought, even decades after the grant, directly against the honorand (or his heirs), who would be assessed for their merits and worth (pace Kremmydas [2012] 344). In addition to goal is to enact this replacement law and that the public action against Leptines’ law is the correct way to achieve this goal.

Demosthenes’ account of the procedure followed by himself, Apsephion, and Phormion has given rise to considerable debate among scholars.¹ These debates focus on two main issues. The first issue is: how did the public procedure against inexpedient laws fit within the nomothesia procedure to enact new laws? The second issue is: what was the correct procedure to enact a new law, and how did Demosthenes expect it to be enacted in this case? These issues are of central importance for our understanding of Athenian law and legal procedure because they help us to understand how the Athenians achieved consistency in their legislation, which was a key feature of the rule of law, an essential part of democratic ideology.²

One of the main complications is the contradiction between Demosthenes’ account of the procedure followed against Leptines’ law and a document inserted into the text of Demosthenes’ Against Timocrates (24.33). According to Demosthenes (e.g. §88) the ultimate aim of Apsephion’s public action was not just to repeal Leptines’ law, but also to enact new legislation (i.e. the replacement law). On the other hand, Apsephion had clearly brought a public action against an inexpedient law when prosecuting Leptines’ law. Like all public actions, the case would have come before a court. Yet we know that after 403 all nomoi had to be enacted by the nomothetai. One could not enact one law by bringing a public action in a court against another law. Most scholars have dissociated the action against inexpedient laws from nomothesia and assumed that its sole function was to repeal laws. It was not used to repeal contradictory laws when someone proposed a new law.

---

This view of the function of the public action against inexpedient laws depends on information found in the inserted document at Dem. 24.33. This document states: ‘It is prohibited to repeal any existing law except at a session of nomothetai. And then, any Athenian who wishes to repeal a law, shall propose a new law to replace the one repealed’. This provision seems to prove beyond a doubt that in order to repeal an existing law one had to go before the nomothetai and that to remove contradictory laws as part of nomothesia one did not bring a public action against an inexpedient law. This has important implications: if this view is correct, it would mean that Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes could not have enacted their new law by using the public action against an inexpedient law and they could also not have used this action to repeal Leptines’ law. On the contrary, they should have gone before the nomothetai to repeal Leptines’ law. This would in turn imply that Demosthenes’ statements about the appropriate procedures for enacting new laws are incorrect and that the procedure Apsephion followed in bringing the case against Leptines’ law was highly irregular.

8 Cf. Harrison (1955) 26; Hansen (1991) 164; Kremmydas (2012) 24; Canevaro (2015) for the institution of the new nomothesia in 403. Cf. also Hansen (1978) and (1979), who shows that laws were consistently enacted by the nomothetai throughout the fourth century.
11 E.g. when at §89 he states that ‘on the one hand, if someone thinks that any of the existing laws is not good, he can bring a public action against it; on the other hand he proposes a replacement law’.
12 This conclusion is inescapable unless one postulates that the procedure here described is prescribed by an old law in disuse. This was argued by MacDowell (1975) 65, 73 and passim, but his interpretation has been shown by Hansen (1979-80) 92-5 and Rhodes (1984) 56 to be untenable (see below pp. 000-00).
Two main solutions have been proposed to solve these problems.\textsuperscript{13}

1) The law proposed by Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes to replace Leptines’ law was nothing more than a ruse designed to deceive the judges and convince them that by repealing Leptines’ law they would automatically enact the replacement law.\textsuperscript{14} This was not true, and Dem. 24.17-19, 24-6, and the epigraphical evidence make it clear that laws in the fourth century BCE had to be enacted by the \textit{nomothetai}.\textsuperscript{15} Demosthenes’ aim was simply to repeal Leptines’ law, and none of the accusers had any intention of enacting any new law. If this view is correct, Demosthenes is lying when he describes the procedures he is following. Wolff was the first one to propose this solution, which has been endorsed by Rhodes, Kremmydas and Hansen. Hansen however later retracted his endorsement.\textsuperscript{16}

2) After retracting his endorsement of Wolff’s view, Hansen proposed a new solution.\textsuperscript{17} Because the case was unusual (more than one year had passed since the approval of Leptines’ law, the original accuser, Bathippus, was dead, and the law had therefore been formally enacted), the \textit{thesmothetai} devised an \textit{ad hoc} procedure that combined features of the \textit{nomothesia} procedure with others from the public action against inexpedient laws. On the one hand, the \textit{thesmothetai} took the election of advocates (\textit{syndikoi} or \textit{synegoroi}; Dem. 24.36, 20.146) and the proposal of a new law from the \textit{nomothesia} procedure. On the other, they took the trial in court from the public action against inexpedient laws. Instead of having the new law enacted by the \textit{nomothetai} (as in the \textit{nomothesia} procedure), it would be enacted by the court upon \textsuperscript{13} I do not deal here in detail with the reconstructions of Hansen (1979-80) and Calabi Limentani (1981), as these have been respectively retracted and convincingly refuted by Hansen (1985).

\textsuperscript{15} Cf. Canevaro (2013a) 143-50 and (2013b) 80-93 and Hansen (1978) and (1979).
\textsuperscript{16} In fact Leptines claimed that Apsephion, Demosthenes and Phormion had no intention to get the new law enacted (cf. §§98-9).
\textsuperscript{17} Hansen (1985) 350-1.
the repeal of Leptines’ law.

Hansen’s solution collides with several objections. First, it gives the thesmothetai the power to create new procedures similar to that of a Roman praetor, yet the sources show that they could not create new procedures. The thesmothetai had only the power to receive charges and to check that the defendant’s offence and the relevant procedure were actionable on the basis of a written statute, and that the accuser had framed his charges in accordance with the key words of the relevant statute. If a magistrate were to accept a charge that did not follow one of the procedures prescribed in the laws of the city, he would be subject to prosecution at his euthynai ([Arist.] Ath. Pol. 48.4). Second, as we will see in Section 3, Demosthenes never states that the new law would automatically be enacted if the court voted to repeal Leptines’ law.

This is an opportune moment to revisit these issues: the recent publication of Kremmydas’ commentary on Demosthenes’ Against Leptines and of my own study of nomothesia and of the relevant documents fully justify a reconsideration of the topic. In particular, I have shown that the documents inserted into the text at Dem. 24.20-3 and 33, which have been used by scholars as evidence for reconstructing the key features of the nomothesia procedure, are unreliable forgeries. I have also shown that Demosthenes’ own statements about nomothesia in Against Leptines and Against Timocrates are generally consistent with each other and are confirmed by the evidence of inscriptions.

---

19 The law discussed at Andoc. 1.86 states that magistrates could not make use of unwritten laws.
21 Kremmydas (2012); Canevaro (2013a) 84-104 and (2013b).
22 Canevaro (2013b), (2013a) 80-104.
I summarise here the main steps in the nomothesia procedure following my recent reconstruction: 1) in order to introduce a new law, a preliminary vote in the Assembly, at any point of the year, had to be held that would allow new laws to be proposed (Dem. 24.25; IG II¹ 320 = SEG 12.87, IG II² 140); this vote, as all votes in the Assembly, had to be preceded by a probouleuma of the Council; 2) once new proposals had been authorized by the Assembly, all new proposals had to be posted in front of the monument of the Eponymous Heroes (Dem. 24.25; 20.94), so that anybody could see them; 3) the bills had to be read out by the secretary in each Assembly until the appointment of the nomothetai (Dem. 20.94); 4) in the third Assembly after the preliminary vote, on the basis of the bills presented, the people had to discuss the appointment of nomothetai and pass a decree of appointment (Dem. 24.25; 20.92); 5) opposing laws had to be repealed before the new laws could be enacted by the nomothetai (Dem. 24.32, 34–5; Dem. 20.93); 6) presumably at the same meeting of the Assembly that appointed the nomothetai expert synegoroι were elected to defend those laws whose repeal was necessary for enacting the new laws (Dem. 24.36; 20.146); 7) if the proposer of a new law failed to abide by any of these provisions, anyone could prosecute him on a charge of enacting an inexpedient law (Dem. 24.32), and if the case was heard within a year from the enactment of the law, the punishment could be anything the court decides, from a small fine to atimia or death.

In my previous essays,²³ I did not however examine how opposing laws were to be repealed in step 5 of the procedure. This issue is key for our understanding of the procedure followed by Apsephion in bringing his public action against Leptines’ law.

²³ Canevaro (2013b) and (2015).
This article will therefore attempt to shed light on the nature of the procedures followed in the case Against Leptines, and on how they work in the wider context of fourth-century nomothesia. Section 2 will examine the statements of Dem. 24.32 and 34 and compare them with those of Dem. 20.88-89 and 93-4. It will explore what was the correct procedure for repealing contradictory laws in the nomothesia process and the ways of using the public action against inexpedient laws. In particular, this section will show how this action was used in one way in the Against Timocrates and in another way in the Against Leptines. Section 3 studies how the new law of Apsephion, Phormio and Demosthenes was to be enacted.

2. How does one repeal a contradictory law? The purposes of the γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θείναι

Previous reconstructions of the procedure followed in the Against Leptines all assume that the information provided by the document found at Dem. 24.33 is reliable. They are therefore based on the principle that according to the laws on nomothesia established laws were (and could be) repealed only by the nomothetai. This contradicts the account of the procedure against Leptines’ law followed by Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes. This document is however an unreliable forgery.24

If one disregards the information of the document at Dem. 24.33 and looks instead at Diodorus’ words before and after the law is read out (Dem. 24.32 and 34), one finds that nothing there contradicts Dem. 20.88-89: ‘[Timocrates] also committed another crime, which was to introduce his proposal in violation of all the established laws. You will clearly understand this in a minute. Take and read for me first this law here, which explicitly forbids the enactment of any law contrary to the existing laws, and if someone enacts it, provides for a public action against him. Read it. [...] You have heard the law. [...] It prohibits proposing a law contrary to the existing ones unless one rescinds the one already in effect’ (trans. Harris). Diodorus simply states that before enacting a new law (with the nomothetai) one has to repeal any contradictory laws, but does not explain how and where these contradictory laws must be repealed. This detail must have been contained in the law about nomothesia, but because it is irrelevant in the context of the Against Timocrates, the orator does not mention it in his summary. The account of Dem. 24.32-4 (excluding the document) therefore does not clash that of Dem. 20.88-9.

There is moreover no evidence elsewhere that existing laws had to be repealed by the nomothetai. One passage that seems to envision this possibility may in fact support the opposite view and suggest that the nomothetai were not usually in charge of repealing laws. Demosthenes in the Third Olynthiac (3.10) addresses the Athenians in the Assembly with the following words: ‘Do not be amazed, men of Athens, if I say something that most of you will find unexpected. You should appoint lawmakers. Use these lawmakers not to pass a law – you have enough of them – but to repeal those laws that are presently harming your interests’ (trans. Trevett). He expects that

---

25 Timocrates had not repealed the contradictory laws, and Diodorus was not enacting any new law.
26 We have evidence for only six γραφαὶ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτῆδει θεῖναι: Dem. 20; 24; two examples at 24.138; Aeschin. 1.34; Lys. fr. 86-7. Hansen (1974) 45-6 shows that Dem. 18.102-5 is a case of γραφὴ παρανόμων, pace Wolff (1970/2) 30 and 39 n. 102; cf. also Canevaro (2013a) 267-71. In none of these references is there any claim that laws must be repealed by the nomothetai. The procedure described at Aeschin. 3.38-40 does not involve strictly speaking the repealing of a legitimately enacted law by the nomothetai. The nomothetai must rather choose between two existing contradictory laws brought to their attention by the thesmosthetai which one should be retained. Because the nomothesia procedure should prevent a law from being enacted if it contradicts an existing one (cf. Canevaro forthcoming), when the thesmosthetai find two contradictory laws, this means that somewhere along the line an irregularity has occurred, and one of them is illegitimate. The nomothetai are tasked with deciding which one is legitimate. It is possible moreover that this procedure may be an innovation later than Dem. 20 (cf. Kremmydas [2012] 28-32).
the Athenians will be surprised (μὴ [...] θαυμάσητε) to hear that he advises summoning the nomothetai not to enact a new law (μὴ θήσθε νόμον μηδένα), but to repeal some of the existing laws. This suggests that the normal responsibility of the nomothetai was enacting new laws,\textsuperscript{27} and it was unusual that they may repeal one.\textsuperscript{28} One may argue that what is paradoxical here is not to have a law repealed by the nomothetai but rather, in accordance with the document at Dem. 24.33, to have a law repealed without passing an alternative law. Yet the remark εἰσὶ γὰρ ύμῖν ἰκανοί after the exhortation ἐν δὲ τούτοις τοῖς νομοθέταις μὴ θήσθε νόμον μηδένα (which is what is supposed to be παράδοξον) suggests that the result of using the nomothetai the normal way would be to increase the number of laws, which is to be avoided because there is enough of them (Dem. 24.142 and 20.91-2 also lament that there are too many laws). If the new laws that Demosthenes exhorts the Athenians not to enact were only replacement laws, then they would not add to the number of Athenian laws, which would remain the same, and therefore there would be no need to remark εἰσὶ γὰρ ύμῖν ἰκανοί. This expression makes better sense if we understand it to mean that the normal role of the nomothetai is that of enacting new laws and not that of repealing existing ones.

Because the document at Dem. 24.33 is not reliable, there is no reason to reject out of hand the account of the procedure followed to repeal Leptines’ law given in the Against Leptines, which puts the judges of a lawcourt in charge of repealing contradictory laws. We should therefore pay careful attention to the statements about the legal procedure followed to repeal Leptines’ law, in particular §§89-90 and 93-94 (as well as §96, Dem. 24.32-4 and 3.10). These passages make clear that the public \textsuperscript{27} This is consistent with what we learn at Dem. 24.24-32, cf. Canevaro (2013b) 141-2, 143-50 and Canevaro (2013a) 80-93.

\textsuperscript{28} This is further evidence against the authenticity of the document at Dem. 24.33, which supplements Canevaro (2013b) 156-8 and (2013a) 102-4.
action against inexpedient laws could be used in two ways: 1) to repeal contradictory laws before enacting a new one, as part of the nomothesia procedure (as in Dem. 20); 2) to repeal a law (and punish its proposer) that had not been enacted following the proper procedures or which contradicted existing laws, without enacting any new law (as in Dem. 24).

2.1 Dem. 20. 89-90

At §88 Demosthenes contrasts Leptines’ law with the proposal that he and his associates have made, which allows the Athenians to revoke awards granted to those who no longer deserve them and those who have deserved their awards to keep them. Demosthenes then asserts that he and his associates have followed all the correct procedures (§89). He states that there is nothing strange or new in the way they are bringing a charge against Leptines’ law and proposing a replacement law (καὶ τούτων πάντων οὐδὲν ἐστὶν ἡμέτερον καινὸν εὑρημα). Demosthenes mentions that these very procedures have not been followed by Leptines, and this charge is repeated at §94: Leptines has failed to repeal a contradictory law before enacting his. Even though Demosthenes charges Leptines with procedural violations when enacting his law, it is clear from both passages that the main point of his argument in this passage is to show that the procedure followed by the accusers is correct.29

Demosthenes claims that the procedure through which they are legislating is in accordance with an ‘old law’ (ὁ παλαιὸς [...] νόμος οὗτω κελεύει νομοθετεῖν). The 29 The same focus is stressed at §93: ἡμεῖς δ’, ὁ ἄνδρες Ἀθηναίοι, πάντα, καὶ παρεισφέρομεν πολλῷ καὶ κρείττω καὶ δικαίωτερον τοῦ τούτου νόμον. γνώσεθε δ’ ἀκούοντες. Note also that Leptines was not personally liable (§144), and therefore his procedural violations are tangential to the main point of this section. On the other hand, Demosthenes states explicitly that Leptines had attacked himself, Apsephion and Phormion at the anakrisis, arguing that the procedure followed was incorrect and the replacement law a ruse (§§99-100).

use of the adjective παλαιός, together with the description at §91 of new and shameful legislative practices, led MacDowell to believe that the procedure followed by Apsephion was set forth in an old law passed in 403/2, which was no longer in effect. According to MacDowell, Leptines enacted his law by following a new legislative procedure enacted around 370, which he believed Demosthenes discusses with disapproval at §91-2.

There are three objections to MacDowell’s view. First, at §§91-92 Demosthenes is not describing new legislative procedures that replaced old ones, but the abuse of the standard legislative procedures by contemporary politicians. The language used in the passage strongly suggests that the present situation in which ‘The laws do not differ one iota from decrees, and the laws to be followed when passing decrees are more recent than the actual decrees themselves’ (trans. Harris) has resulted not from new laws but from the schemes of powerful men (§91: κατεσκεύασαν). Second, the official who received the written indictment could not have accepted charges based on a statute that had been repealed: he would have run the risk of being attacked at his euthynai.

Third, the law that Demosthenes calls ‘old’ at §89 is simply a summary of the procedures for nomothesia described at §§93-5 and at Dem. 24.18-19, 24-7, 28-32, 34-6. We will discuss Dem. 20.93-95 in Section 2.2. The law on nomothesia is described as ‘old’ (παλαιός) not because it has been repealed and is no longer in effect, but rather to confer more authority on it. In the next paragraph it is also attributed to Solon, despite the fact that it was probably enacted in the aftermath of the restoration of democracy in 403/2.\textsuperscript{33} That the point of mentioning the antiquity of a law is to stress its authority is made even clearer by the words of Demosthenes at 24.24, which also refer to the law on \textit{nomothesia}: ‘All these laws have already been in effect for a long time, men of the court, and have often proved themselves beneficial for you.’\textsuperscript{34} And moreover παλαιός is used elsewhere in the \textit{Against Leptines} to enhance the authority of laws that Demosthenes mentions explicitly as valid and in effect (§§18, 28 e 153).\textsuperscript{35}

---

The παλαιός νόμος therefore is simply the current law on \textit{nomothesia},\textsuperscript{36} the one Demosthenes claims that he, Apsephon and Phormion are following. In Demosthenes’ words at §89 the correct method of legislation this law prescribed (οὕτω κελεύει νομοθετεῖν) is composed of two separate parts, γράφεσθαι (bringing a public charge) and proposing a replacement law, two different actions that are connected by the particles μέν... δὲ. The first part, γράφεσθαι, does not appear to be compulsory whenever one wants to enact a new law. It is in fact qualified by the protasis of a future more vivid conditional clause – ‘if someone thinks that any of the existing laws is not good’ (ἀν τίς τινα τῶν ύπαρχόντων νόμων μὴ καλῶς ἔχειν ἱγήται) – which applies, from a syntactical point of view, only to γράφεσθαι μέν.

Bringing a public action is therefore necessary only if one believes that one of the \textsuperscript{34} Cf. also Antiph. 5.14 = 6.2, and Canevaro (forthcoming b).

\textsuperscript{36} Hansen (1979-80) 88-95 argues (following Schöll [1886]) that this law, summarized more in detail at §893-5, is that quoted at Dem. 24.33 (MacDowell named it “Repeal Law”). Yet the document at Dem. 24.33 is a forgery. Moreover its provisions do not completely match all those of the παλαιός νόμος (which shares some also with the law summarized at Dem. 24.24-5). The παλαιός νόμος is more likely to correspond to the rules of \textit{nomothesia} in their entirety, as they are described at Dem. 24.18-36 (cf. Rhodes [1984] 56-7; Canevaro [2013b] 141-2, 143-50 and Canevaro [2013a] 80-93).
existing laws are not good, and not in order to propose any new law.\textsuperscript{37} In fact, the protasis ἀν τίς τινα τῶν ὑπαρχόντων νόμων μὴ καλῶς ἔχειν ἴγκται must refer to the rule that when one proposed a new law, one needed first of all to repeal any contradictory laws (cf. Dem. 24.32-4 and §93).\textsuperscript{38} The middle form γράφεσθαι (cf. also §96 πρὸν τοῦτον ἐλπίζει γραψάμενος) must refer to bringing a public action, a γραφή. This is the sense of the verb in legal language. MacDowell wished to translate the infinitive as ‘getting a law put down for formal consideration of its repeal’,\textsuperscript{39} yet here and at §96 the verb γράφεσθαι clearly refers to the current action brought by Apsephion, an action against an inexpedient law (cf. §94).

Demosthenes clearly states that the correct venue for repealing contradictory laws before enacting a new one is a lawcourt, and that this is done through a public action against inexpedient laws (\textit{pace} the document at Dem. 24.33).\textsuperscript{40} The second prescription mentioned at §89 of the law on \textit{nomothesia} (ὁ παλαιῶς [...] νόμος οὗτω κελεύει νομοθετεῖν), marked by δὲ, is παρεισφέρειν δ’ αὐτὸν ἄλλον (‘to present a replacement law’). The second part of the procedure aims to enact a new law because the existing law on the subject is not good: this is taken as a given because it was the case with Leptines’ law. So the summary of the law on \textit{nomothesia} applies to the present case brought by Apsephion. In fact, in many cases new laws were probably enacted without repealing any existing law (this is what both Leptines and Timocrates apparently did, cf. §§95-7 and Dem. 24.32-64). This was not in itself irregular, as long as no contradictory laws existed, because γράφεσθαι, as we have seen, was compulsory only when an existing law contradicted the new bill.

At §89 therefore Demosthenes provides an account of the rules of \textit{nomothesia}

\textsuperscript{37} \textit{Pace} Hansen (1985) 346-52 and Rhodes (1984) 57 who read these words (and Dem. 24.33) as describing a procedure which allows new legislation only when one replaces old laws.

\textsuperscript{38} Cf. Canevaro (2013a) 91-4 and (2013b) 147-50, and (forthcoming) for the rationale of this norm.

\textsuperscript{39} MacDowell (1975) 64.

\textsuperscript{40} Kahrstedt (1938) and Atkinson (1939) understand this clearly.
that contemplates a further use of the public action against inexpedient laws. Dem. 24.32-4 (excluding the document) informs us that this procedure could be used against the proposer of a law (either during its enactment or afterwards), on the grounds that he had failed to repeal contradictory laws or to follow the correct procedures. Here (at §89) the public action against an inexpedient law can be used to repeal contradictory laws in order to enact a new law (the Assembly elected σύνδικοι of the ‘contradictory’ laws, cf. §146, Dem. 24.36). The public action is therefore an integral part of the procedure of nomothesia itself. Scholars, mainly on the basis of Dem. 24.33, have doubted Demosthenes’ words, and claimed that he is lying and trying to convince the judges that they are in fact nomothetai. It is important therefore to compare his account here with what he says right after the law on nomothesia is read out by the clerk, at §§93-4.

2.2 Dem. 20.93-4

Demosthenes makes it very clear at §92 that the reason why he is asking the clerk to read out the law on nomothesia is to confirm the argument made at §§89-92: Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes have followed all the correct procedures (‘so that I may not rely on mere assertion, but show the actual law that I am discussing…’). The summary of the law should therefore be read in the light of what Demosthenes states at §§89-90. The orator asks the clerk to read out the law on nomothesia with the words λαβέ μοι τὸν νόμον καθ᾽ ὑπὰν οἱ πρότερον νομοθέται. The expression οἱ πρότερον νομοθέται is parallel to the description of the law as a παλαιός νόμος at §89, and coherent with the description at §§90-2 of nomothesia.

---

41 Pace Kremmydas (2012) 350-1, who claims that this passage has a different emphasis from §§89-92.
two imaginary times, one when the laws were respected, and one when they are ignored. The law read out and summarized at §§93-4 is therefore the same law discussed at §89, and this is confirmed at §93, where the law is once again ascribed to Solon, as it had been at §90. It is also the same law discussed at Dem. 24.18-35.

The account of the provisions of this law opens with the words ‘You see the excellent method that Solon provides for enacting laws’ (ὁ Σόλων τοὺς νόμους ὡς καλῶς κελεύει τιθέναι), which parallel ὁ ὕτω κελεύει νομοθετεῖν of §89. The provisions which are relevant to the current case are: πρῶτον μὲν παρ’ ὑμῖν, ἐν τοῖς ὀμομοκόσιν, παρ’ οἶσπερ καὶ τάλλα κυροῦται, ἐπεὶ τὰ λύοντα τοὺς ἐναντίους. The correct procedures imply an assessment by the ὀμομοκότες and the repealing of contradictory laws. ἐν τοῖς ὀμομοκόσιν refers to those that have sworn the Judicial Oath at the beginning of the year and can therefore act as judges in the lawcourts.

The most obvious interpretation of this expression is therefore that ‘first’ (πρῶτον μὲν) the procedure required a step before the judges in a lawcourt. Scholars have however normally subscribed to a different interpretation: this would be a reference to the nomothetai, who according to the document of Dem. 24.20-3 were selected among those that had sworn the Judicial Oath at the beginning of the year and can therefore act as judges in the lawcourts. Demosthenes would therefore be mentioning the Oath in order to deceive the judges about their identity and 42 Cf. Canevaro (forthcoming) for an analysis of this narrative. It is however unlikely that οἱ πρὸτερον νομοθέται could be the nomothetai in charge of enacting laws, those mentioned in the motion and enactment clauses of fourth-century nomoi (e.g. IG II² 244 l. 6: δεδοχθαί τοῖς νομοθέταις). They are instead opposed to the politicians described at §91, who ignore the correct rules and procedures. They must therefore be the proposers of new laws, who followed the correct procedures. νομοθετής is in fact used in literary sources and inscriptions both for those that assessed and enacted new laws, and for those that proposed them (cf. e.g. Dem. 24.103, 113, 152; IOrorop 297 = IG II³ 348 with Lambert [2004] 106 and 109 n. 84).

---

44 Cf. e.g. Boegehold (1995) 186-7 for the practical arrangements of the Judicial Oath; Harris (2013) 101-37 for its provisions and its importance. The document at Dem. 24.149-51 is unreliable, cf. Canevaro (2013a) 173-80 (Sommerstein-Bayliss [2013] 70-80 accept that it is not a transcription of the oath at one time, and that it contains unreliable features, but would like to salvage some more clauses).

prerogatives, and convince them that they are nomothetai. The document at Dem. 24.20-3 is however a later forgery.⁴⁶ The information it provides is unreliable, and could in fact derive from this very mention of the ὀμομυκότες. And moreover it is important to notice that ὀμομυκότες is used again in this very speech at §118, and refers unequivocally to the judges, and that the nomothetai are never mentioned at §§93-4. It is therefore important to pay close attention to Demosthenes’ words at §93 in the context of the argument developed from §89, without pre-judging the issue based on the document at Dem. 24.20-3.

The main issue with the expression πρῶτον μὲν παρ᾽ ἕμν, ἐν τοῖς ὀμομυκόσιν, παρ’ οἴσπου καὶ τάλλα κυροῦται, ἔπειτα λύοντα τούς ἐναντίους is the meaning of πρῶτον μὲν [...] ἔπειτα. The most obvious meaning – the temporal one – cannot be accepted. If we were to interpret the ὀμομυκότες as nomothetai, the temporal sequence of the procedure would be the wrong way round: according to the rules discussed at Dem. 24.32-4 (excluding the document) the contradictory laws must be repealed before the final decision of the nomothetai, not afterwards.⁴⁷ And in the following paragraph καὶ πρὸ τοῦτων, which introduces the previous procedural steps (posting the bills before the monument of the Eponymous Heroes and having them read out in the Assembly), shows that Demosthenes is not following any temporal sequence in describing the procedure of nomothesia.⁴⁸ Kremmydas suggests plausibly that πρῶτον μὲν [...] ἔπειτα may refer to the disposition of the provisions in the text of the law just read out.⁴⁹ It is as likely that they may simply reflect the logical priority of the two notions in Demosthenes’ argument. Whatever the case,

---

⁴⁷ If we were instead to follow the document at Dem. 24.33 (which is however unreliable) the contradictory laws would be repealed by the nomothetai and there would be no temporal sequence.
⁴⁸ The scholiast is aware of this and comments: ἐν τῷ τῷ τάξει, ἀλλὰ τῷ ἀξιώματι καὶ τῷ κυροῦν (Schol. Dem. 20.93).
⁴⁹ Kremmydas (2012) 250-1. He also claims that the order mirrors that of the document at Dem. 24.33, but this is a circular argument, as this passage is probably the source of that document.
Demosthenes is explicit at §§89 and 96 that contradictory laws must be repealed through a public action, and therefore by the judges (the most obvious interpretation of ἐν τοῖς ὁμομοιόσιν). We should therefore consider the possibility that πρῶτον μὲν παρ’ ύμιν, ἐν τοῖς ὁμομοιόσιν and ἔπειτα λύοντα τοὺς ἐναντίους may not describe two separate stages of the procedure, but rather two separate features (separately mentioned in the law) of the same procedural step: repealing the contradictory laws. This interpretation is confirmed by the wider context of the argument, which still reflects the agenda expressed at §89: the public charge against Leptines’ law is in accordance with the rules of nomothesia. It is therefore completely natural that, after the law is read out by the clerk, Demosthenes would concentrate on those particular rules that concern the repealing of contradictory laws and govern the very public charge brought against Leptines’ law.

ἐν τοῖς ὁμομοιόσιν is qualified by παρ’ οἴσπερ καὶ τάλλα κυρωῦται. This qualification is not problematic for this interpretation. κυρῶ, in the passive and middle, means ‘to confirm’, e.g. a marriage (Hdt. 6.130, ἔκεκύρωτο ὁ γάμος Κλεισθένει). Andoc. 1.85 uses it with reference to the laws of the city, which are already valid but are reviewed and confirmed in 403 after the restoration of democracy (ἐδοκιμάσθησαν μὲν οὖν οἱ νόμοι, ὁ ἄνδρες, [...] τοὺς δὲ κυρωθέντας ἀνέγραψαν εἰς τὴν στοάν). This is the meaning of the verb at §93: in order to enact a new law one must first bring a charge against existing laws that contradict its provisions; these laws are in effect, and the judges in the lawcourt must decide whether to confirm or repeal them (and therefore make the enactment of the new law by the nomothetai possible). When Demosthenes states that the judges have the power to confirm καὶ τάλλα, he is probably referring to the power to repeal or confirm decrees of the Assembly through a γραφὴ παρανόμων, to which Solon (in Demosthenes’ account) adds the power to repeal or confirm existing laws. But even if one wants to read more in this expression, a reference to ‘sovereignty’, this is not incompatible with the dikastai: the lawcourts in Athens had in fact the role of final review of the decisions of both the Assembly and the nomothetai, performing a task akin to modern judicial review, and some scholars have argued that the sovereignty ultimately rested with them.51 The implications of their powers were not lost on ancient commentators, and Arist. Pol. 1274a 4-5 famously stated that Solon was criticized by some for κύριον ποιήσαντα τὸ δικαστήματος πάντων (‘making the lawcourts sovereign of everything’).

Demosthenes at §93 is discussing the need to bring a charge against contradictory laws as the first step in enacting a new law. The expression ἐν τοῖς ὀμωμοξόσιν must refer to the judges, not to the nomothetai. His words right after the law is read out do not contradict, but rather confirm the account of §89. And the need to repeal contradictory laws in a lawcourt before the judges is confirmed a few paragraphs later. At §94 the orator reminds the judges of other procedural steps of nomothesia: posting the new bills before the monument of the Eponymous Heroes and reading them in each Assembly after the original vote that allowed new proposals to be made.52 He then repeats that he, Apsephon and Phormion have followed all these rules, while Leptines has not. At §§95-6 the orator has some provisions of Leptines’ law read out, and immediately afterwards an existing law that, he claims, contradicts them. He therefore points out that according to the rules of nomothesia, the same ones that he is following in bringing a charge against Leptines’ law, 52 Cf. Dem. 24.18 and 24-6 with Canevaro (2013b) 143-50.

Leptines should have brought a charge against that law before enacting his, and his failure to do this makes the existence of this contradictory law evidence against him. This passage confirms the account of §§89 and 93: contradictory laws must be repealed through a public charge.

Demosthenes then mentions that according to ‘another law’ if one fails to repeal contradictory laws before enacting a new one he can himself be subject to a public charge (καὶ ταῦθ᾽ ἐτέρου κελεύοντος νόμου καὶ κατ᾽ αὐτὸ τοῦτο ἕνοχον εἶναι τῇ γραφῇ, ἐὰν ἐναντίος ἦ τοῖς πρότερον κειμένοις νόμοις). This ἐτέρος νόμος is not actually a different law, but just a different clause of the law on nomothesia, the clause discussed also at Dem. 24.32-4 (excluding the document), which authorizes the use of the γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι against those that do not follow the correct procedures and rules for legislating.\(^{53}\) The word νόμος can in fact be used to mean a law in its entirety as well as specific provisions of a law.\(^{54}\)

2.3 Provisional conclusion

All the relevant passages of the Against Leptines are consistent in stating that existing laws had to be repealed by judges in a lawcourt, and not by the nomothetai, and Dem. 24.32-4 (excluding the document) does not contradict this. They isolate two different purposes for which the γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι could be used, prescribed in two different provisions of the law on nomothesia (cf. καὶ ταῦθ᾽ ἐτέρου κελεύοντος νόμου). 1) It had to be used to repeal in a lawcourt, before the judges, contradictory laws before a new law could be enacted by the nomothetai; these existing laws were defended by advocates (called syndikoi or synegoroi)\textsuperscript{55} elected by the Assembly, as explained at Dem. 24.36 and §146 (this is the use of the procedure made by Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes). 2) It could be used, after a new law had been enacted or while it was being enacted, against the proposer who did not follow the correct procedures or failed to repeal contradictory laws, without enacting any new law; if the charge was brought within a year, the proposer was personally liable (this is the use of the procedure made by Diodorus in Dem. 24).

3. How was the replacement law enacted? The correct procedure and Leptines’ objections

Some scholars have interpreted certain passages in Against Leptines as implying that the law proposed by Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes would automatically be enacted once the court repealed Leptines’ law. This is impossible because Demosthenes at Dem. 24.18-19, 24-32 and 34-35 is adamant that the body that enacted new laws were the nomothetai and not the lawcourts. Scholars have therefore argued either that Demosthenes is lying and attempting to deceive the judges into thinking that they could act as nomothetai or, alternatively, that the use of the public action against an expedient law followed at the trial was an ad hoc procedure created by the thesmothetai.\textsuperscript{56} In this section I discuss the relevant statements at §§89 and 99-100 and show that Demosthenes does not suggest that the judges would automatically enact the replacement law by their vote against Leptines’ law. On the contrary, Demosthenes reveals that he is well aware that this will have to happen before the nomothetai. I also show that Leptines’ objections to Apsephion’s use of the public action against inexpedient laws have nothing to do with attempts by Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes to convince the judges that they have the power to enact the replacement law. Leptines objects instead to the inclusion (permitted by the thesmothetai) of the replacement law in the plaint presented by Apsephion when he initiated his action against Leptines’ law.

\textsuperscript{55} Cf. Rubinstein (2000) 43-5 for the relationship between these two terms, and Canevaro (2013b) 156 for their use in the procedure of nomothesia.

\textsuperscript{56} Cf. above pp. 000-00 for these interpretations, and for the problems with them.

3.1 Dem. 20.89

The first controversial statement is at §89: Demosthenes states that if one believes that one of the existing laws is not good, he must bring a public charge against it and propose a new law to replace it. He adds: ὃν ἄν τιθῇ λύων ἔκεινον, ὑμᾶς δὲ ἄκοψαντος ἐλέσθαι τὸν κρείττω. According to most scholars, Demosthenes is allegedly claiming that the replacement law will be enacted automatically as a result of the repeal of the old law by the judges in court.57 The description of the procedure is very compressed, but Demosthenes’ choice of words does not necessarily support this interpretation. ὃν ἄν τιθῇ λύων ἔκεινον does not necessarily mean that the new law was enacted automatically when the old one was repealed. The present participle λύων, used predicatively, does not always have a causal sense (the proposer enacts his law because the other is repealed, that is, as a result of the repeal of the other law), or a temporal sense, which would express contemporaneity (when he repeals the other law, he enacts the other law simultaneously).58 The meaning of the participle can also be conditional (if he were to repeal the other, on the condition that he repeals the other. The use of ἂν with the subjunctive in the relative indicates in fact that the enactment of the new law is a possibility, not a certainty, and a prerequisite for its enactment is the repeal of the other law. One does not therefore need to interpret Demosthenes’ words as describing a one-step procedure, in which the new law is enacted at the same time as the old law is repealed. Given what we know about the procedures of nomothesia and the general context of the passage, we should interpret Demosthenes’ words to mean that the new law may be enacted (at a separate stage of the procedure, before the nomothetai) if, and only if, the old one is previously repealed. This interpretation fits well with the general argument in this section that Apsephion’s decision to bring a public action against inexpedient laws against Leptines’ law is the correct way to proceed when attempting to enact a law to replace it.

58 The temporal relationship of the present participle with the main verb should also be understood from the context, cf. Smyth (1920) no. 1872, 2061.

The expression ὑμᾶς δ᾽ ἀκούσαντας ἐλέσθαι τὸν κρείττω (‘you then have the power to hear them and chose the better one’ [trans. Harris]) does appear to describe a one-step procedure in which the judges hear the relevant arguments and make a decision between two laws. Here again Demosthenes’ description is very compressed, but it is nothing more than a brief summary of the entire procedure of nomothesia. ‘You’ (ὑμᾶς) does not refer only to the judges, but rather to the Athenians in general, who sat in the courts as judges, voted on proposals in the Assembly and on laws as nomothetai. Throughout all the various stages of nomothesia, the people are made aware of the options before them (in the Assembly,

---

59 Cf. e.g. Ar. Av. 1390 with Smyth (1920) no. 2067 and Aloni (2003) no. 54b. Note the translation of Harris (2008) 131: ‘should the former law be abolished.’

60 Cf. Harris (2008) 49, note 121: ‘Demosthenes here combines two procedures: first, the public action against the old law; second, the process of enacting the new law.’

61 The orators often identify the judges with the demos in general, of which the courts are a manifestation. Cf. e.g. Dem. 21.11, 91 with MacDowell (1990) 235, 314, and also Hansen (1981) 520, who argues however that this is not evidence that the dikasteria were regarded as a manifestation of the demos (cf. against this view Rhodes [1981] 160; Ostwald [1989] 34-5 n. 131).
in the courts, by reading proposals placed before the Eponymous Heroes; cf. §94 and Dem. 24.25), and ultimately make a decision between the existing laws that contradicts the new proposal and the new proposal. This very abbreviated summary of the nomothesia procedure does not imply that the procedure Demosthenes claims to be following involves only one stage. In this preliminary description of the procedures he is following he does not go into too much detail, and his words, if read out of context, may create the impression of a faster and simpler procedure than was actually the case. But Demosthenes is not lying: a few paragraphs later he has the actual law on nomothesia read out, and later still, as we shall see, he states explicitly that the new law will be enacted by the nomothetai and not by the judges (§137).

3.2 Dem. 20.98-100

The most extensive discussion of the enactment of the replacement law is found at §§98-100. Here Demosthenes not only discusses the enactment of the replacement law, but also Leptines’ objection to the way Apsephion is using it at the trial. Prior to this, Demosthenes had discussed the rules about nomothesia and had shown that Leptines failed to repeal an opposing law before enacting his own law. Next he has the clerk read out the law that he, Apsephion, and Phormion have proposed to show that it is better than Leptines’ law. At §98 Demosthenes states that not even Leptines will try to deny this, because he cannot prove that his law is better. Instead he will use the same arguments he employed at the anakrisis before the magistrate:62 that the

---

62 On the workings of the preliminary hearings recently Faraguna (2009) and Thür (2008), who show that these involved cross interrogation by the litigants as well as the introduction of documents that were then sealed in an echinos. Only these documents could be used in the lawcourt (pace [Arist.] Ath. Pol. 53.2: SEG 32.329 shows that this rule applied not only to private cases, but also to public ones). Harris (2006) 410-18 also shows that an accuser could withdraw a charge as long as he did so formally at the anakrisis.
replacement law had been written next to the other to deceive the judges, and that Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes in fact do not intend to enact it.

This discussion shows that the replacement law had already been discussed at the anakrisis and had been placed in the echinos as one of the documents to be read out in court. It also shows that Leptines had already objected to it at the anakrisis. Hansen argues that the thesmothetai innovated in this case, and Leptines was contesting the legitimacy of their innovation, which would have brought about the enactment of the replacement law when the court voted to repeal Leptines’ law. As noted above, there is no reason to think that the thesmothetai could have made such an innovation.⁶³ Kremmydas on the other hand argues that ‘at some point during the anakrisis the prosecution would have declared their intention of passing their draft law in place of Leptines’ law and that would probably have created confusion’ and that ‘the thesmothetai were probably not competent juristically to disqualify it from the documents appended to the written documents of the graphe. It was up to the dikastai of the trial to decide the relevance of the appended documents’.⁶⁴ Kremmydas concludes that the fact that the thesmothetai accepted the replacement law is irrelevant, and that Leptines was right in objecting to it, because the public action against inexpedient laws had nothing to do with the enactment of a replacement law. Yet Kremmydas’ reconstruction of what happened at the anakrisis is problematic for several reasons: first, what was relevant or not for the verdict was defined by the written plaint,⁶⁵ not by the judges in court, and the judges swore to vote only on the ⁶³ Cf. above p. 000-00 n. 000-00.

---

⁶⁵ The written plaint, called usually engklema in private cases and graphe in public ones, was of key importance in Athenian judicial procedure: it recorded the identity of the litigants, the issues which were the subject of the action, the laws and procedure according to which the action was brought, and the offence or crime contested (which was phrased according to the relevant laws). On the structure and importance of the written indictments see the thorough discussion of Harris (2013) 114-36, and more briefly Thür (2008) 65-72. The Judicial Oath compelled the judges to base their judgement
Second, the plaint was introduced when the charge was first brought before the magistrate, not at the preliminary hearings. What was then Leptines objecting to? Demosthenes states clearly that he objected to the παραγεγράφθαι of the replacement law (cf. also οἱ θεσμοθέται τούτον ὑμῖν παρέγραψαν, §99), which seems to refer to the inclusion of the replacement law in the written indictment (γραφή). If the replacement law was included in the written indictment, this would have meant that any comparison of its merits with those of Leptines’ law would have been considered relevant in court (εἰς αὐτὸ τὸ πράγμα ἔρειν, [Arist.] Ath. Pol. 67.1). The inclusion of the replacement law in the written indictment was therefore key for Apsephion’s strategy at the trial: if the law had not been included in the written indictment, the judges would have had to restrict their decision to an evaluation of the merits of Leptines’ law and could not have compared the two laws. Had the new law not been included in the plaint, Leptines would have had an easier time defending his own law because his opponents could not argue that the judges should repeal Leptines’ law because there was a better alternative available. Leptines therefore objected to the inclusion of the replacement law in the plaint at the anakrisis because he knew that its inclusion would weaken his case when pleading before the judges in court. He was not objecting to any innovations made by the thesmothetai in the public action against enacting an inexpedient law.

When Demosthenes at §99 claims that the thesmothetai (at the anakrisis) παρέγραψαν the replacement law, what he means is that they did not oppose its... inclusion (as Leptines asked them to), but rather confirmed it – in this sense they ‘included’ the replacement law. Demosthenes uses παρέγραψαν as shorthand while summarising what happened – the thesmothetai dismissed Leptines’ objections and refused to force Apsephon to remove the law from the indictment – at the same time giving the impression that the inclusion of the replacement law, because it was so legitimate and necessary, had been effected directly by the thesmothetai.\textsuperscript{67} The reason for which the thesmothetai did not agree with Leptines’ objection, and allowed the replacement law to stay in the plaint, is expressed by Demosthenes very clearly: this was in accordance with the law on nómothesia. Kremmydas nevertheless argues that the thesmothetai presumably did not allow the replacement law to stay because this was lawful, but simply because ‘the thesmothetai were probably not competent juristically to disqualify it from the documents appended to the written documents of the graphe’. There is evidence however that the magistrate who received a charge had the power to force a change in the plaint in certain circumstances: in Lys. 13 Dionysius accuses Agoratus of murdering his father and brings an apagoge against him. The statute authorizing this procedure however required that the wrongdoer be caught ἐπ’αὐτοφόρῳ, that is, in circumstances that made his guilt obvious.\textsuperscript{68} Dionysius did not include this expression in his plaint (possibly to make it easier for him to prove his charge), but the Eleven forced him to add the expression to the indictment and to follow the language of the relevant statute.\textsuperscript{69} At Isae. 10.2 we likewise learn that the archon compelled the litigant to add in the engklema that his mother was the sister of Aristarchus (II), thus allowing the accuser to make a claim on \textsuperscript{67} This is what happened at Isae. 10.2, where the archon forced the speaker to add to the plaint that his mother was Aristarchus (II) sister: ἡνέγκασαμαι μὲν οὖν [...] τὴν μητέρα τὴν ἐμὴν ἐν τῇ ἀνακρίσει Ἀριστάρχου εἶναι ἀδέλφην προσγράψας.

\textsuperscript{68} For the requirement that accusers follow the language of the relevant statute when drawing up the plaint see Harris (2013) 118-25.
\textsuperscript{69} Cf. Harris (2006) 373-90 for the meaning of this expression.
the estate of Aristarchus (I) not as the grandson of Aristarchus (I), as he wished to, but as the nephew of Aristarchus (II),\(^{70}\) Magistrates (in the case of the Against Leptines, the thesmothetai) had therefore the power to require accusers at the anakrisis to make changes to the plaint if this contradicted the provisions of the relevant laws.\(^{71}\) Leptines asked them to do exactly this, but they allowed the proposed law to remain in the indictment. Demosthenes states that they did this in accordance with the law on nomothesia (cf. §99: ὁ παλαιὸς κελεύει νόμος, καθ’ ὁν οἱ θεσμοθέται τοῦτον ὑμῖν παρέγραψαν).

On what grounds did Leptines object to the inclusion of the replacement law in the plaint? Demosthenes makes this clear: he claimed that had his law been repealed, Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes would have not proceeded to enact their own law (§98, ἐὰν δ’ ὁν αὐτὸς ἔθηκεν λυθῇ, τοῦτον οὐ τεθήσεσθαι). That this was the objection is confirmed by the repeated replies to Leptines’ argument in the rest of the speech (§§99, 100, 137): Demosthenes promises the judges that he, Apsephion and Phormion will enact the replacement law and observes that there are laws and procedures against those who deceive the people which Leptines and others can use to compel them to carry out their promise. If this was in fact Leptines’ objection, it is not surprising that the thesmothetai ignored it. Demosthenes, therefore, pace Kremmydas,\(^{72}\) did not reply to Leptines’ argument by arguing that ‘the law-proposal in question was only brought as part of the evidence of the graphe to demonstrate the defects of Leptines’ law by contrast to a better law’. The replacement law was not only part of the evidence sealed in the echinos; it was directly relevant to the issues defined in the plaint. And the thesmothetai did not allow the inclusion of \(^{72}\) Kremmydas (2012) 361-2 confuses the status of the documents in the echinos with that of those in the plaint.

\(^{71}\) Cf. Harris (2013) 182.

the replacement law in the indictment because this was an unusual case\textsuperscript{73} or because they were innovating,\textsuperscript{74} but simply because the law on nomothesia supported Apsephion’s, Phormion’s and Demosthenes’ position. Demosthenes asserts in fact at §99 that the thesmothetai accepted the law because of the παλαιος νομος, the law on nomothesia. The παλαιος νομος, as we have seen above, prescribed that in order to enact a new law one had first to repeal opposing laws through a public action against inexpedient laws. So the repeal of Leptines’ law was a normal stage of the procedure for enacting the replacement law. This meant that the inclusion of the latter in the written indictment was fully justified.\textsuperscript{75} This must have been what the accusers said at the anakrisis and thereby provided the rationale for the thesmothetai’s decision.

Demosthenes moves then at §99 to a further argument: Leptines’ objections show that even he knows that the replacement law is better than his own. Because he cannot make a convincing argument about substance, Leptines concentrates on procedure.\textsuperscript{76} The transition to the next argument is made through a paraleipsis (‘I shall leave aside this point’ – ἐὰν ὑπωνικαίοις), which contains yet another compressed description of how the replacement law will be enacted. This passage has given scholars the impression that Demosthenes envisages a one-step procedure requiring only one vote in which Leptines’ law would be repealed and the new law enacted at the same time.\textsuperscript{77} First of all, one must dispense with the idea that this paraleipsis implies that Leptines’ procedural arguments are strong.\textsuperscript{78} The paraleipsis is here used simply as a transition to a further argument, which is strong even if his opponents

\textsuperscript{73} According to Wolff (1970/2) 36, followed by Hansen (1979-80) 89-90, Rhodes (1984) 58 and Kremmydas (2012) 342-3, 361-2 and passim, it was midway between a normal nomothesia procedure and a γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτίθειναι θείναι.

\textsuperscript{75} Likewise, contradictory laws were included in the plaint for a graphe paranomon against a decree (cf. Aeschin. 3.200 with Harris [2013] 121-2).

\textsuperscript{76} A similar argument is made by Demosthenes at Dem. 21.26-7.

\textsuperscript{77} Cf. e.g. Wolff (1970/2) 28-44; Calabi-Limentani (1981) 360 and Hansen (1979-80) 89-91.

\textsuperscript{78} This is how Kremmydas (2012) 363 reads it (cf. also e.g. Wolff [1970/2] 28-44; Calabi-Limentani [1981] 360 and Hansen [1979-80] 89-91).
dared to attack his previous arguments (ἐνα μὴ περὶ τούτου τις ἀντιλέγῃ μοι refers to this possibility). The same strategy is used in this speech at §§116 e 121: after showing that the ancestors honoured their benefactors, Demosthenes considers for a moment a scenario in which this was not the case, only to show that this would make no difference in the present circumstances. This obviously does not mean that the argument that the ancestors were principled and honoured their benefactors is weak. Demosthenes states in the paraleipsis that introducing a replacement law, like the public action against enacting inexpedient laws itself, is an essential part of the procedure followed by Apsephion, Phormion and himself, and prescribed by the law on nomothesia. Including the replacement law in the plaint was therefore legitimate. This argument is not weak, but it can be made shortly because it has been made extensively at §§89 and 93-4.

The expression τῇ ὑμετέρᾳ ψήφῳ τοῦ τούτου νόμου λυθέντος τὸν παρεισενεχθέντα κύριον εἴναι σαφῶς ὁ παλαιὸς κελεύει νόμος has been interpreted as a clear statement that Demosthenes envisions a one-step procedure which will repeal Leptines’ law and enact the replacement law with one vote of the judges. In fact this expression needs not be interpreted in this sense. The main verb is κελεύει, which does not necessarily mean ‘to order’, but rather ‘to authorize’, ‘to provide a procedure for’. Therefore the law on nomothesia clearly provides for the replacement law to go into effect (τὸν παρεισενεχθέντα κύριον εἴναι) after Leptines’ law has been repealed (τοῦ τούτου νόμου λυθέντος) by the vote of the judges (τῇ ὑμετέρᾳ ψήφῳ). τῇ ὑμετέρᾳ ψήφῳ is linked with the genitive absolute τοῦ τούτου νόμου λυθέντος (‘after the law has been repealed by your vote’), not

79 Cf. Dem. 29.9 with MacDowell (1989) 257–72, (2009) 46–7; cf. also Harris (2006) 131 for another example. See the translation of Harris (2008) 53: ‘the old law […] permits the law substituted in its place to be ratified.’
with τὸν παρεισενεχθέντα κύριον εἶναι. Therefore the vote of the judges only repeals Leptines’ law, which is necessary before the replacement law can be enacted (which could otherwise be attacked through a public action against an inexpedient law). This passage therefore, like that at §89, does not actually state that the repeal of Leptines’ law and the enactment of the new one will happen at the same time and by the same vote. It only states that repealing Leptines’ law is a prerequisite for enacting the new one. The paraleipsis therefore summarizes in one quick statement the argument developed since §89.

3.3 Provisional conclusion

It is clear therefore that neither at §89 nor at §98-99 does Demosthenes state that the judges have the power to enact the new law by their vote or that the new law will be enacted as a result of the present trial. Nor does he state this at §164, when he asserts that if the judges vote as he, Phormion and Apsephion wish, those who deserve their prizes will keep them, while the undeserving will lose them and moreover will suffer any punishment the judges deem fit, according to the replacement law. In this later passage Demosthenes assumes that if Leptines’ law is repealed, the replacement law will eventually be enacted, but he does not insinuate that it will be enacted as a result of this trial, and at §100 he says explicitly that the new law will be enacted in the future, and that Apsephion, Phormion and himself will make sure of this. He states: ‘I, Phormion, and anyone else he wishes to add, have pledged to enact the law’ (trans. Harris). The future infinitive θήσειν τὸν νόμον shows that the enactment of the law will take place in the future, at another stage of the procedure. At §137 Demosthenes

Cf. Harris (2008) 52: ‘once this law has been rescinded by your vote.’

As stated e.g. by Rhodes (1985) 58.
goes so far as to suggest that if Leptines and those elected to defend the law (σύνδικοι) are so convinced that some people do not deserve their exemptions or have other accusations to make against them, they should aim to bring a charge according to the procedure provided by the replacement law, which Demosthenes swears Apsephion, Phormion and himself will enact. But if Leptines and the law’s defendants are so keen, they should enact it themselves at the first available session of the nomothetai! Apart from the joke made at Leptines’ expenses, Demosthenes is well aware of the need for the replacement law to be enacted by the nomothetai and explicitly recognizes that by repealing Leptines’ law the judges are not enacting the new law. There are therefore no grounds for accusing Demosthenes of attempting to deceive the judges into believing that they have the power to enact the new law or that the procedure followed in this case is an innovation involving one vote on both Leptines’ law and the new proposal to replace it. The procedure followed, and advocated by Demosthenes, in this case, does not contradict the account of Dem. 24.18-19, 24-32, 34-35, which makes clear that the correct venue for enacting new laws are the nomothetai, and not the lawcourts.

4. Conclusions: the procedures followed in the Against Leptines and their implications

The arguments laid out in this article offer a new interpretation of the procedures followed and advocated in the case against Leptines brought in 355/4 by Apsephion with the active support of Phormion and Demosthenes. This interpretation has the advantage of being consistent with the procedures of nomothesia as they can be reconstructed from Dem. 24.18-19, 24-32, 34-35 and other sources. It does not posit unlikely procedural innovations effected by the thesmothetai to make sense of alleged inconsistencies, nor does it assume that Demosthenes and his allies managed first to deceive the thesmothetai and then attempted to deceive the judges into believing that a law could be enacted in a lawcourt without the vote of the nomothetai.

Whatever the charge brought originally by Bathippus against Leptines’ law (which was brought within a year and was probably a ψαφή νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι akin to that brought by Diodorus against Timocrates in Dem. 24), a new charge was brought by Apsephion, Bathippus’ son, against Leptines’ law, because Leptines was no longer personally liable after a year (§144). This charge, another γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι, was not however a stand-alone accusation (as the first one probably was). It was part of the wider procedure of nomothesia that would end, if successful, with the enactment of a new law. Leptines does not discuss the early stages of this procedure, which are irrelevant for his argument, but we can assume, on the basis of the information provided at Dem. 24.18-19, 24-25, that it involved a vote in the Assembly opening the floor to proposals of new laws, and publicity of the new law before the monument of the Eponymous Heroes and through readings in the Assembly (§94). It also required repealing all contradictory laws before enacting the new one before the nomothetai (Dem. 24.32-4, excluding the document). This is the rationale of the γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι against Leptines’ law within the procedure of nomothesia: as Demosthenes repeatedly protests, repealing contradictory laws is compulsory when enacting a new one, and therefore Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes are simply following the law on nomothesia when they try to repeal Leptines’ law. And this is confirmed by the fact that Leptines’ law is defended by publicly appointed advocates, in accordance with the provision of the law on nomothesia discussed at Dem. 24.36 (cf. also §146). This is also why they wrote down the text of the replacement law in the plaint against Leptines’ law: the public charge was part of the overall procedure for enacting that law. The thesmothetai agreed with Apsephion, Phormion and Demosthenes that this was the correct procedure. They therefore ignored Leptines’ protests that they had no intention of enacting the replacement law, and this was nothing more than a ruse to repeal Leptines’ law. Demosthenes in response to these accusations promises that they will proceed with enacting the new law at the first meeting of the nomothetai, and points out that if they did not, there are several ways to force them (§§99-100, 137). But before they can do this, the judges need to repeal Leptines’ law, as they cannot enact a new law without first repealing the contradictory laws.

This reconstruction of the procedures followed in the public charge against Leptines’ law, and of the respective cases of the accusers and of the defendants, is therefore consistent with the rest of the evidence about nomothesia, and shows that even a talented speaker like Demosthenes could not misrepresent the wording and the meaning of Athenian laws and procedures beyond recognition. In the Against Leptines, like elsewhere, Demosthenes is quite accurate in reporting the provisions of the relevant laws, in particular in sections immediately preceding or following when they are read out by the grammateus.83

The conclusions of this essay have important implications. First, they show that one of the functions of the anakrisis was to discuss the plaint and to allow the defendant to request modifications or for the officials to make them. This was the case with Lys. 13 and Isae. 10.2, and Leptines tried at the anakrisis of the public charge

---

82 In the case against Timocrates however there were no elected syndikoi, because the public charge against an inexpedient law had not been brought as part of the nomothesia procedure.

83 Cf. on the reliability of the accounts of the orators Canevaro (2013a) 27-36.
against his law to convince the thesmothetai to remove the replacement law from the plaint. Minor modifications of the wording of the plaint might have major implications for the strategies at the trial, and could make it remarkably easier for the accuser to prove his charges or for the defendant to refute them.

Second, it provides further evidence that the functions of the magistrates in Athens were carefully circumscribed, and that they did not have the power to create new procedures or to modify old ones.

Third, it helps to clarify an important step in the nomothesia procedure as reconstructed in Canevaro (2013b). Dem. 24.32-4 (excluding the document) makes clear that contradictory laws had to be repealed before a new law could be enacted by the nomothetai. Yet because the document at Dem. 24.33 is unreliable, we were left with the question of what is the correct venue for repealing contradictory laws in the process of enacting a new one. A correct reading of the evidence of Dem. 20 allows us to answer this question: contradictory laws had to be repealed through a public charge against inexpedient laws. This procedure had therefore two separate purposes: it could be used against the proposer of a new law that had not followed the correct procedures, or had failed to repeal contradictory laws, without leading to the enactment of any new law (this is the use we find in Dem. 24); or it could be used, as in Dem. 20, to repeal a contradictory law as part of the procedure for enacting a new one. Once the contradictory laws had been repealed with a γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι, the new law could be enacted before the nomothetai.

One may wonder what happened after the old law(s) had been repealed by the courts through the γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι and before the new law was

---

84 This supplements the account of the anakrisis offered by Thür (2008) and Faraguna (2009), and that of the importance of plaint provided by Harris (2013) 114-36.

85 The Athenians were obsessed with officials’ misconduct, and circumscribed carefully the power of the magistrates, in particular when it came to legal procedure, cf. Harris (2013) 117-18 and Thür (2008) 70-1.
enacted by the nomothetai. During this period the Athenians were apparently left without any law at all on the matter at stake. And what would happen if the nomothetai refused to ratify the new law? In the case of Leptines' law, this is hardly an issue: once Leptines' law is repealed by the court, the older law confirming grants by the demos (§96) – which Leptines did not bother to repeal – stays valid and unchallenged. But more generally, even in cases in which there was no law beforehand on a given topic, there is no reason for which the Athenians may not have decided to leave a particular topic unregulated. This is indeed what happened whenever a γραφὴ νόμον μὴ ἐπιτήδειον θεῖναι was brought successfully against the proposer of a law within a year from its enactment (as in Dem. 24). The topic of that law remained unregulated, unless a new nomogenesis procedure was started to enact a new law. On the other hand, because once the nomogenesis procedure was started in the Assembly several laws could be proposed, it was not necessarily the case that there would be only one proposal on a given topic. And even if there was only one, and the nomothetai chose not to enact it, they may have asked the prytaneis to put that topic in the agenda of the next Assembly meeting (or of the next nomothetai, as IG II³ 355 ll. 39–40 does with changes to the merismos), in order to receive new proposals if a need was felt for a particular issue to be better regulated.

The fourth implication, if this reconstruction is correct, is that the only evidence we thought we had about the identity of the nomothetai vanishes. Only two passages provided (or seemed to provide) evidence that they were chosen among those that had sworn the Judicial Oath. Because the document at Dem. 24.20-3, which states exactly this, is unreliable,⁸⁶ the expression ἐν τοῖς ὀμομοιώσιν of §93 is the only remaining piece of evidence that would indicate that they were chosen among the potential judges. Yet I have argued in this article that ἐν τοῖς ὀμωμοκόσιν actually refers to the judges that repeal the contradictory laws, not to the nomothetai that will enact the new one (pp. 000-00). If this is correct, there is no evidence to confirm this widely-held view.87 I plan to come back to this issue and discuss various possibilities for the identity of the nomothetai in a separate article. But whoever the nomothetai were, whether they were citizens that had sword the Judicial Oath, a specific committee, or a session of the Assembly labelled nomothetai,88 the nomothesia procedure was distinctive in setting precise (and extended) times to enact a new law, in enforcing a high degree of publicity of new bills, in securing the coherence of the laws of the city through the obligation to repeal contradictory laws, and in involving various bodies (the Council, a normal Assembly meeting, the lawcourts and the nomothetai) in the enactment of new laws.

---

The Athenians had in the fourth century not several contradictory nomothesia procedures enacted at different times89 or valid side-by-side,90 but rather one procedure of nomothesia articulated in a series of clear steps, whose purpose was to allow legislation while at the same time ensuring that the city’s laws were consistent and free of contradictions. The existence of such a procedure does not mean that irregularities never occurred, and that contradictory laws were never enacted. The very existence of the speeches Against Leptines and Against Timocrates shows that sometimes the correct procedures were not followed to the letter, but it also shows that when this happened, mechanisms were in place to correct the problem and even punish the transgressor. The mention at Aeschin. 3.38-40 of a separate procedure that 87 This was attacked with strong arguments by Piérart (2000). Contra Rhodes (2003).

88 This is Piérart’s suggestion, on the basis of the paradosis of Aeschin. 3.39 (τοὺς δὲ πρυτάνεως ποιεῖν ἐκκλησίαν ἐπιγράψαντας νομοθέτας), which he reads as ‘the prytaneis shall hold an assembly labelling it nomothetai’.
89 As argued by MacDowell (1975) and Rhodes (1985).
tasked the thesmothetai with finding contradictory laws among the existing ones and submit them to the nomothetai shows that sometimes laws that contradicted previous statutes were in fact enacted. But the aims of these procedures should not be judged by their failings. These aims are clear: to provide a system for making new laws while at the same time safeguarding the coherence of the laws of the city. As Demosthenes states (§93): ‘opposing laws are repealed so that there is one law for each subject. This avoids confusion for private individuals, who would be at a disadvantage in comparison to people who are familiar with all the laws. The aim is to make points of law the same for all to read as well as simple and clear to understand’ (trans. Harris).

Mirko Canevaro
The University of Edinburgh
mirko.canevaro@ed.ac.uk

Bibliography

Faraguna, M. (2009), ‘Oralità e scrittura nella prassi giudiziaria ateniese tra V e IV

